At last the excitement grew so intense that the podestat or chief magistrate of Florence resolved to send for Dr. Attrapeccini and demand an explanation. A man who was able to restore five dead persons to life could have no difficulty in guessing what was passing in the mind of a podestat, and, accordingly, the magistrate was just about to strike his gong to summon an usher, when the doctor himself was announced.

"You come just in time, doctor," said the magistrate; "I was about to send for you."

"I knew it, my lord, and wished to anticipate your orders," was the reply, uttered in a calm tone that filled the podestat with amazement.

He recovered himself, however, and was going to interrogate the new-comer when the latter exclaimed:

"I understand, my lord, that some of your people here have doubts of my science, and even of my honesty—in fact, that I am suspected of coming to Florence for the purpose of making dupes."

"Something of that kind has been intimated," replied the magistrate.

"They say, moreover," continued Dr. Attrapeccini, "that I intend to decamp in a day or two, before the 1st of May."

"That also has been said," assented the podestat.

"You can understand," said the stranger slowly, "that I owe it to myself to put an end to these reports. I have come to request of you that a guard of ten, twenty, thirty or more men be stationed round my house so as to make it impossible for me to leave Florence before releasing from their tombs five persons, as I have promised. You cannot say that my request is an unreasonable one, since you had determined before seeing me to have me watched."

"Your request is granted," he said. "I shall have your house guarded night and day by twenty men, until the time comes for you to fulfil your promise, or until you change your mind, and acknowledge you were not in earnest. It would, perhaps, be wiser for you to leave the city at once; believe me, it is not safe to put a whole town in commotion. I know the Florentines, and I believe them to be capable of falling upon you in fury, perhaps of hanging you, when they find they have been mocked at and tricked. The least serious mishap that could befall you would be a sojourn of several months in prison while you waited for the public indignation to subside."

"I should deserve even more severe treatment if I failed to carry out my programme," said the doctor.

The doctor's interview with the magistrate was soon known all over Florence, and the news of it served to increase the popular interest and confidence in the stranger.

A week before the first of May, a man about forty years old, and dressed completely in black, entered the doctor's study. He was the Senator Arozzo, celebrated for the violent grief he had displayed on the death of his wife six months before.

"Signor Attrapeccini," said he, briskly, "I do not wish to waste words. Although what you promise is generally considered impossible, I admit that it may be possible, and I have come here to beg you to leave my wife at rest in the cemetery."

"What!" exclaimed the man of science, with a laugh, and the widower repeated his own words earnestly.

"I beg of you," he cried; "I am about to marry again—the banns will be published next month. You would not like to put a man in such a predicament, would you?"

As he spoke he placed a purse full of gold on the table.

"Set your mind at rest," said the doctor, "and continue the preparation for your wedding."

The next day he received a visit from Philippini, the most famous physician of Florence, and, indeed, of all Tuscany; out of every hundred Florentines at least eighty were at one time or another in his care.

"Learned and honoured brother," said he to Attrapeccini, "I trust that you will not do me the injury of bringing back to the light of day any of the unfortunate people who have chanced to pass away while in my hands."

"Certainly not," replied the other. "Just give me the names of the persons you mean."

"That would be a very difficult matter," said Philippini. "Would it not be more simple for you to exclude from your ceremony all my former patients?" and with these words he laid on the table a heap of gold coins.

"It shall certainly be as you wish, my dear brother," said the foreign physician.

The door had hardly closed upon Philippini when it was opened again to admit two brothers named Gavazza. The Duke Pierre Gavazza and his brother, the Marquess Paul, had risen, partly by their own merits, and partly by good luck, to the first rank in the Italian nobility; but their journey had been long and difficult, as their father had been a miller. It was the miller whom they did not wish to see restored to life.

Dr. Attrapeccini was shocked, and exclaimed angrily that he could not believe it possible that two persons could be so unnatural as to oppose the resuscitation of their own father. It was nothing less than parricide, and he would not connive at such baseness! He had not any intention of reviving the miller, but now he would take good care to do so; and, unless he changed his mind, the old Gavazza would be the first person resuscitated in the cemetery.

The dismay of the duke and the marquess may be imagined. They offered money, but though they had brought a large sum with them it was not sufficient to allay the scruples of Attrapeccini, and each of the brothers was obliged to sign a note.

The eve of the first of May arrived, and the guards round his house were doubled, and received the strictest orders, for the chief magistrate knew that the people would blame him if the invoker of the dead were allowed to escape. It was estimated that 50,000 persons were assembled in the cemetery or its vicinity on the first of May, at six in the morning, and as the doctor did not appear at the first stroke of the hour as he had promised, 50,000 voices cried out, "Attrapeccini! Attrapeccini!" At the same time the chief magistrate presented himself at the stranger's house, and found the interior of it just as empty as the exterior was well guarded.

The restorer of the dead had departed by way of the cellar, where there was an opening into the next house, and the chronicle reports that he took with him a sum equivalent to his 50,000 florins, which had been paid to him on consideration of not performing a miracle and of leaving the dead in their graves.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

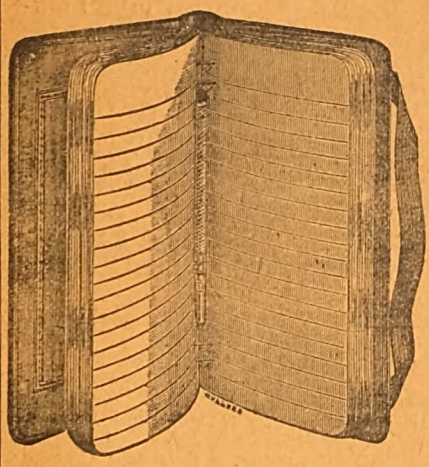
Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

COLLINS'

"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK,

WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST AND THE BEST.

THE SIMPLEST AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register" the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,

Bridewell Place, London, E.C.; 139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces for £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

OUR SOLID ENGLISH HOUSES.

NEARLY all the houses in England are of brick or stone. All the better for England, too, say I. We don't have so many fires. At the time of the great fire, when London was burned from London Bridge away over to Smithfield, it was a wooden town. It won't happen again—nor anything like it. The reason is too plain to need pointing out.

Now, why can't we learn to protect ourselves against diseases—which are fires in the body—in the same common-sense fashion? Then we might walk among fevers and epidemics like the three Hebrew children in the fiery furnace. "Not possible," say you. Yes, it is; only we won't take the trouble.

I introduce you to a lady who says that in May, 1894, she took such a terrible cold that she went near to dying of it. My point is, that what a wooden house is to a spark of fire, her body was to the influence we commonly call a "cold," but which should be called a "heat." Let us read what she says:—

"In the spring of 1888 I fell into a low, weak state. I was always tired, heavy, and sleepy, and much troubled with mazy bouts. I had no appetite, and great pain and tightness at the chest after meals. I often belched up a sour fluid; indeed, all my food seemed to turn into acid. Cold, clammy sweats used to break out over me, leaving me quite exhausted. Finally I got so weak I could barely walk about, and often, when outdoors, would swoon and fall down in the street.

"I consulted different physicians and took many medicines, but in spite of it all I was no better. This, in general terms, was my condition for six years. In May, 1894, I took a violent cold which pulled me down. My face swelled and my throat almost closed up. At times I was driven nearly mad with an excruciating pain in my head. There was an awful taste in my mouth, particularly in the morning. It was sickening, and made it impossible for me to even taste food, much less to enjoy it.

"From this time on I grew so much worse that I am not able to picture my sufferings in words. For months together I took no solid food at all; I lived on milk, sago, and other liquids. By now I was so weak I had to be lifted in and out of bed, and so wasted that little was left of me besides skin and bones. I was so nervous and excitable that a mere knocking at the door would make me tremble all over and set my heart beating like a drum. Usually I lay all day long on the couch, too weak to stir. When I attempted to walk alone I fell down.

"Both my husband and my friends gave up all hopes of my recovery. The doctor said I might get better, but he did not think I would. Thus, hopeless and helpless, I sank lower and lower.

"In November, 1894, a gentleman told my husband about Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup, and how it had benefited him when he was ill with an ailment like mine. That it would do me any good (so far gone was I) appeared to be too much to expect; but we got a bottle from Mr. West Lang's drug stores, Teviot Dale, and after I had taken it a short time I began to improve. My appetite revived, and I could eat without vomiting or feeling any of my former pain and distress. As I got stronger, the bad symptoms that had made me miserable so long, passed away, and I gained flesh and began to take an interest in life once more. I need only add that I continued with Seigel's Syrup until I was a new woman. I can now do my work easily and eat anything. This remedy saved my life, and I am willing all the world should know it. (Signed) (Mrs.) Sarah Ann Gould, No. 1, Froggart's Yard, Brady Street, Portwood, Stockport, February 15th, 1895."

This lady's bitter experience will appeal to the hearts of all who read it. But the point to bear in mind is this: When she took the bad cold in May, 1894, she had already been suffering six years with chronic inflammatory dyspepsia, which had thrown her whole system out of order, filled her blood with poisons from the diseased stomach, and rendered her an easy victim to any chill or exposure. The cold was only an incident of her trouble; it was like the fire which catches and consumes inflammable material. Keep your digestion right and your blood pure with Mother Seigel's Syrup, and you won't take cold. Please consider this fact carefully and act on it. Fasten your doors and windows and you keep out thieves.

Digitized by Google

STORIES OF ALL SORTS FOR ALL PEOPLE.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 336. FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 8, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

Enquire at

SINGER'S

ABOUT

Presentation

OF

FIVE THOUSAND

5/- ART SETS

For Executing ART NEEDLEWORK similar to that on view at SINGER'S numerous Show Rooms.

Can be Learned Easily.

Can be Worked Cheaply by a New Process.

Our New Machine does both Plain Sewing and Art Work.

INSTRUCTION FREE.

THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY,

CITY SHOW ROOMS: 147, CHEAPSIDE, E.C.

Branch Offices Everywhere.

GOOD AND LASTING EMPLOYMENT TO INDUSTRIOUS MEN WHETHER EXPERIENCED OR NOT.

Digitized by Google

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker.
E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

TOOTH-ACHE
CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE
All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES. Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science: they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

ONE BOX OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS
will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.
To whiten the hands and skin, use
Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.
1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s 9d. Postage, 3d.
S. HARVEY, Balham Hill, London, S.W.
Beware of injurious imitations.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.
Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL
BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
SUCH AS
Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

WHERE A PAIR OF TROUSERS OR A SUIT OF CLOTHES
(FASHIONABLY MADE)
are Wanted, you will find
IRVINE, IRWIN & CO.,
20, Cheapside,
The Cheapest and Best Tailors
IN THE WORLD.

SPECIAL LINES:
TROUSERS, 7/6, 10/-, 12/6.
SUITS, 25/-, 30/-, 35/-.
ALL WORK
Guaranteed First Class.

Write for patterns and Easy Self-Measurement Form, SENT FREE, with particulars of our free presents.

IRVINE, IRWIN & CO.,
20, Cheapside, E.C.

ECZEMA
and Skin Diseases of all kinds can be cured at once if you
Use "ANTEXEMA."

This is sold by all Chemists and Drug Stores, or may be had post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., or 4s. 9d., of the ANTEXEMA Co., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W.—Drop a post-card to us, mentioning this paper, and we will send you, post free, a Little Book, containing valuable information about Skin Diseases of all kinds.

TO INVENTORS.

An Invention Protected for £1. Handbook, "How to Patent an Invention," giving full particulars, forms, &c., free from HUGHES & YOUNG, "Patent Editors" to the principal newspapers, 23, Coleman Street, London, E.C. Established 1829. INVENTORS ASSISTED IN WORKING OR SELLING INVENTIONS. Read "Patents."

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.
JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

New Harrison. SWIFT GOLD MEDAL.

KNITTER
KNITS STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" & "SUN" Machines.
HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticisms, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 336.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 8, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

WORDS THAT PAINT AND PICTURES THAT SPEAK

CHAPTER I.

"ADORATION is ignorance," she was saying, as the great rocking-chair swayed lazily backwards and forwards in front of the fire, to the imminent peril of a fragile wicker table on which the tea-things were spread.

Her companion moved a little silver vase filled with hot-house flowers and deposited his cup on the mantel-piece before he turned and faced her.

"What are you talking of?" he said. "Men or things?"

The girl leant forward clasping her hands round her knees, and laughed.

"The beautiful in art appeals only to the artist," she answered in her deliberate way. "Of course, I was speaking of men. Our sincerest admiration is reserved for those about whom we know little or nothing. That is what I mean."

"'Familiarity breeds contempt,'" he quoted. "It is not exactly an original thought."

"Perhaps not. But, you see, I was looking at it from the other point of view."

"Apropos of what? If I had not seen such a great deal of you since we came down here I might flatter myself——"

"Please don't," she interrupted, with a little deprecating gesture. "The great beauty of being cousins is that we need not pay each other compliments."

They were standing together on the hearth now. The man in his pink coat and muddy boots and spurs, the tall, graceful girl at his side in the pretty mauve tea-gown for which her shopping habit had been changed.

"You entirely misunderstand the benefits of the relationship," he said, with a tinge of disappointment in his voice. "But, if it is not me, who or what is it, may I ask, that has put you into this philosophic mood?"

"It's no good telling you," she answered, staring down into the grate. "You would only laugh. Men of the world never can understand anything but the common-place."

"Look here, most beautiful woman, if you talk like that, I'm going."

She allowed him to reach the door without a word, and then she looked up and called him back.

"My dear boy, how dense you are," she said. "Can't you see how I am longing to unburden myself, and to get a little sympathy?"

He came back—not very graciously—and seated himself on the music-stool with an air of mock resignation.

"To tell you the truth," the girl said, leaning her elbow on the piano and looking down on him, "I have fallen in love—genuinely and desperately in love—with a man whom I have never seen."

All Rights Reserved.

"Impossible!"

"But nevertheless a fact."

"And you think that if you knew him the illusion would be dispelled?"

"Yes. Adoration, as I said just now, is ignorance."

The man turned round and began strumming a few notes on the piano.

"If I were a journalist," he said, "I would write an article on the littleness of greatness, or the superiority of names over people."

"I am not in love with a name."

"Then what in the world are you in love with?"

"With the wonderful personality of which every line of the man's work seems to speak."

"So he is an author then?"

"Yes."

"And you imagine you can tell what sort of a man he is from the way he writes. It's absolute nonsense, my dear girl. A style may be characteristic, but an author never says what he really thinks in a book."

"Perfectly true, O Solomon! I do not suppose for a moment I know the real man. I am in love with the ideal.

Digitized by Google

Led the way across the prettily furnished room.

Not with the author of 'A Broken Altar,' but with my conception of him."

"With the hero of the book, in other words—like most other women of course, you confound the author with characters he creates."

The girl laughed.

"With what the hero would have been if he had been allowed to live, perhaps. He is a machine instead of flesh and blood. He says things and does things because the author puts words in his mouth and pulls wires. In real life such a man would have been perfect."

The girl had resumed her seat and was rocking herself backwards and forwards again and smiling. Her companion watched her with amused contempt in his look and reverence in his heart. She was an enigma to him; his efforts to understand were always futile.

"It must be a great assistance in your work," he remarked, thoughtfully referring to her gift of reading between the lines and catching the reflection of words.

"Illustrating stories would be quite impossible without the knack of meeting the author half way. The best novelists leave the reader to write half their book, and the artist has to help them. Come and see my studio."

He followed her as she rose and led the way across the prettily furnished room into the hall, where their appearance was greeted by a low growl of pleasure from a magnificent boar hound, which rose leisurely from the broad circle of light in front of the fire, and came over the polished boards to meet them.

At the same moment the girl was conscious of a quick furtive glance from her companion.

"Do you recognise him?" she asked, and the white hand laid affectionately on the broad smooth head trembled a little in spite of herself.

"'Peter the Great!' How long have you had him?"

It was asked carelessly, with an evident effort to make the question appear nothing more than a polite endeavour to be interested, but there was an unmistakable note of jealousy in the man's voice.

"Only a month. Lord Worthington gave him to me at Christmas. Wasn't it kind of him?"

To this the man vouchsafed no response, but he muttered something under his breath, and the girl knew that he was taking someone else's name in vain, and laughed.

Passing through a swing door at the further end of the hall they entered a narrow corridor, when the young artist was the first to break the silence by looking back over her shoulder and saying:

"Don't forget the promise you made this morning, Duncan, never to breathe a word of what I am doing to anyone. If the mater knew I was illustrating stories for the magazines, instead of copying family portraits or painting lifeless landscapes, I believe she would send me off to a convent."

And with this word of admonition she turned the key of her studio and ushered her visitor into a lofty room, one side of which was taken up almost entirely by an enormous window, which, however, was now partially covered by the half drawn curtain. In this magnificent abode of Art no furniture was allowed to find admission except the oldest and rarest oak, and the high panelling on the walls was of the same material, and exquisitely carved by Lady Evelyn's own hand—a fact which she duly announced to her cousin. The broad settees were heaped with luxurious cushions, and an immense Persian carpet occupied the centre of the polished floor.

At the further end of the room stood several easels covered with heavy cloths; but contenting herself with merely pointing these out, the girl led the way to a writing-table near the fire, on which a heap of proofs and pen-and-ink sketches were scattered.

"Here are the opening chapters of 'A Broken Altar,'" she said, turning the galleys over in her hand. "It is not nearly finished yet, but it is already being published in the Illustrated London News as a serial story, which makes my work a great deal harder."

"And the gifted author's name is——?"

"Guy Provost."

"I have never heard of him before."

"Nor have I. This is his first novel, I believe."

"Lucky man."

"Why?" with a little, conscious laugh.

Her companion did not answer. He had picked up an advance copy of the paper from a low stool by the fender and stood with his back to Lady Evelyn, turning over the pages.

"It is a love story," he said presently.

"Yes—so far."

"And you have drawn yourself as the heroine."

"No," half indignantly, "I don't flatter myself that I am quite so good-looking as that."

"But it is you," he persisted.

"It is what I would like to be if I could make myself."

"Blessed are they who do not fish. Come here, Evelyn."

The request surprised her, but she crossed over to his side obediently.

"Now look in the glass."

Standing on tip-toe on the fender Lady Evelyn saw her own image in the mirror side by side with a full-page illustration of a remarkably pretty girl, who was stooping down and unfastening the muzzle of a wretched, starving dog who had found a delicious bone that it could just lick with its tongue and nothing more.

"There is a certain resemblance," she confessed, looking from the one to the other and thinking that, after all, she must be more beautiful than she had ever supposed. "But I give you my word of honour, Duncan, I did not mean it. You don't think the mater will guess?"

"She must notice the likeness," the man said, not very consolingly.

"But she won't know who drew the picture!"

"Considering that it is signed with a nom de guerre, perhaps not."

Lady Evelyn drew a sigh of relief. Her companion turned over a fresh page. The next moment a sudden exclamation broke from his lips.

Controlling his emotions with no little difficulty, he turned round and faced his cousin.

"Who was your model for the hero of this story?" he asked, holding out the paper and placing his finger sternly on the figure of a young man who was depicted in the act of stepping from a hansom cab on to the pavement in front of a West-end club.

His manner startled the girl.

"No one," she said. "What do you mean? Why are you looking at me like that?"

She took the paper, glanced at the offending illustration, and suddenly turned crimson as it flashed across her that the figure she had drawn was a fac-simile of no one else in the world but "Peter the Great's" late master.

Digitized by Google

For a moment she did not know whether to laugh or to cry at her situation. It was certainly embarrassing and undignified, and her cousin's reproachful stare made her feel unaccountably guilty.

"So Lord Worthington is your idea of Mr. Guy Provost, personified in his hero; no wonder you have fallen so deeply in love with him!"

"Lord Worthington is nothing of the sort," replied Lady Evelyn indignantly. "I never thought of him once when I drew that picture. Do you think a man like that could write such a clever book as 'A Broken Altar'? The likeness is the merest accident; I promise you it is, Duncan . . . If you don't leave off laughing I shall never speak to you again. . . . Duncan, I hate you!"

Her companion took no notice of this outburst.

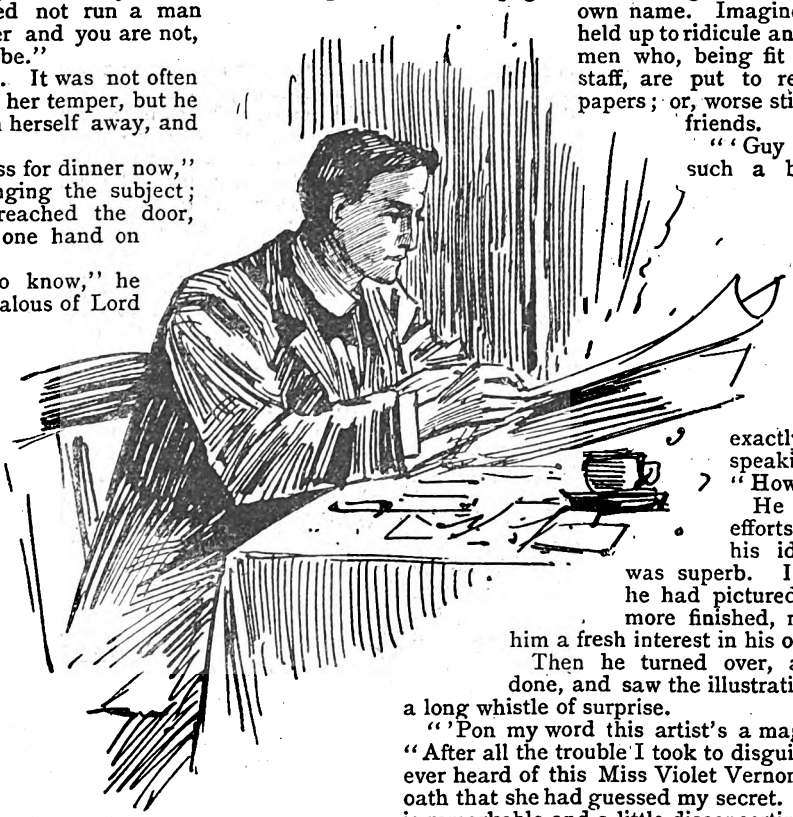
"You are profaning your old friends," he said, "and will be sorry for it when you find that Mr. Provost, whoever he may be, is only an ordinary mortal after all."

"He is no such ordinary mortal as you or Lord Worthington, at all events. You need not run a man down because he is clever and you are not, however jealous you may be."

Duncan Stuart laughed. It was not often that my Lady Evelyn lost her temper, but he knew that she had given herself away, and understood.

"I must go up and dress for dinner now," he said, suddenly changing the subject; "Au revoir." As he reached the door, however, he turned with one hand on the handle.

"If it interests you to know," he said, "I am far more jealous of Lord Worthington than of your precious author. We reserve our sincerest admiration for those whom we know least, as you have been kind enough to explain to me this afternoon. But when, in our anxiety to pay homage to the unknown, we take to ourselves the image of some familiar friend as the nearest approach to the ideal—it is, my dear cousin, a very serious symptom." And thereupon he closed the door.



A copy of the "Illustrated London News."

CHAPTER II.

BREAKFAST was always served at a little table drawn near the window when Lord Worthington was alone at the castle. Several vases of rare exotics ornamented the centre of the cloth, and the warm glow of the beech logs blazing cheerfully in the wide, old-fashioned hearth flashed on the silver coffee-pot and service. A pile of letters and newspapers lay by the side of the solitary place which had been set, and the smoking dish covers betokened that everything was ready with the exception of his lordship himself.

At five minutes past nine a tall, leisurely-looking individual opened the door and strolled towards the table. The expression of the handsome, clean-shaven face did not betray any particular talent or genius. It was that of a young man, well under thirty, with smoothly brushed black hair, blue eyes, regular features, and the most charming manners in the world. With all his good looks, however, Lord Worthington was not conceited. Perhaps it may have been that he belonged to that limited and probably mythical class of men and women who are sufficiently conscious of their own attractions and superiority to be more or less indifferent to them.

Lord Worthington did not profess to have any ambitions in life beyond those of the ordinary country gentleman. He frankly confessed an abhorrence of politics, and avowed a preference for friends of a sporting type. No one, as a matter of fact, expected anything more from him. The last thing, however, which most men are is what they appear to be.

On this particular morning Lord Worthington evinced something very much like excitement as he caught sight of the contents of the letter-bag lying beside his plate. He looks through them quickly, and everything is thrown aside except a long yellow envelope marked IMMEDIATE and a copy of the Illustrated London News, which he unrolls and opens out with the nearest approach to haste that he ever permits himself.

"I wonder what on earth people would think if they knew I was writing a Socialist novel—with a moral!" he thought as he smoothed the paper out with his hand and began turning over the pages. "Thank goodness I did not write under my own name. Imagine the ignominy of being held up to ridicule and criticised by the young men who, being fit for nothing else on the staff, are put to reviewing books for their papers; or, worse still, being chaffed by one's friends.

"'Guy Provost!' That's not such a bad nom-de-plume after all," he reflected, as he propped the paper against the loaf and ran his eye quickly down the double column of type.

At this moment he noticed for the first time the illustration on the opposite page and gave a little start of pleasure.

"That's it! that's it exactly!" he exclaimed, speaking unconsciously aloud. "How magnificently drawn!"

He had rather dreaded the efforts of someone else to put his ideas into form, but this was superb. It was the scene just as he had pictured it all to himself, only more finished, more complete. It gave him a fresh interest in his own work.

Then he turned over, as the other man had done, and saw the illustration of the hero and drew a long whistle of surprise.

"'Pon my word this artist's a magician!" he ejaculated. "After all the trouble I took to disguise myself, too. If I had ever heard of this Miss Violet Vernon before I would take my oath that she had guessed my secret. As it is, the coincidence is remarkable and a little disconcerting."

He read through the first instalment of his story, and went on with the proofs; and when he had finished he wiped his forehead, and said something about the room reminding him of a Turkish bath.

He had never seen his own thoughts in print before, and he felt half ashamed of them now that they faced him in black and white. On the whole, however, he was contented,—far more, indeed, than he had expected to be—with his own handiwork. The story, so far as it went, was certainly clever, and decidedly well written. In fact he was rather surprised at his own success.

Criticising the novel from the most impartial standpoint, he felt that there was a certain artificiality about his characters. The attempt to metamorphose himself, under a careful disguise, into a hero, had not been altogether unsuccessful, but he could not help noticing that the heroine was a little unnatural, and the emotions of both rather too mechanical to enlist the sympathies of the reader in the human interests of the story.

"The socialism is admirable," his lordship thought to himself as he crossed over to the fireplace and lighted a cigarette, "but the love story has a suspiciously fictitious air about it. The truth of the matter is, I suppose, that I am writing about a subject of which I know very little."

Digitized by Google

And, indeed, Lord Worthington, society man that he was, had never been engaged in a serious love affair or felt his heart beating for a woman.

"I have taken too much care of myself, confound it," he meditated, as he stared from his place of vantage on the hearth at the wintry landscape outside. "One must have experience before one writes, and my education has been neglected. I suppose there would really be plenty of time now before I attempt to finish my story. Only——"

He broke off abruptly, startled at his own thoughts.

After all, he was not quite sure whether a man would be justified in carrying on a flirtation with a girl merely to become conversant with the mysterious way of lovers. There could be no doubt, however, that this was the only step to take if he wished to make his story true to life. It would be easy enough to write about the real thing while undergoing all the sensations and to describe the inevitable little scenes while living in an atmosphere of such soft influences.

He was still setting forth the pros and cons of this ethical problem, and giving them all a most conscientious scrutiny, when his eye happened to fall on the copy of the Illustrated London News which still lay open on the table.

"I know that face reminds me of someone," he exclaimed, taking up the paper and giving a closer inspection than he had yet bestowed on the portrait of the girl illustrating his own story.

He stared at it stupidly for a moment, and then a light broke across his face.

"Lady Evelyn, of course! What a curious likeness. Why in the world did I not think of her as my heroine? Why——"

For the second time he left a sentence unfinished, and with the air of a man who has made a sudden determination and does not mean to allow the grass to grow under his feet, he swung round on his heels and rang the bell.

"Tell Stevens," he said, as the footman appeared, "to saddle the grey at once, and say I shall want one of the chestnuts as a second horse."

Then he looked at his watch.

"There is plenty of time if I am quick," he mused, moving towards the door. "The hounds meet at the kennels to-day and Lady Evelyn is sure to be there. Knowing the young lady's reputation I need not feel any qualms about playing the rôle of lover to her, and then—heigh ho! for a place on a pedestal among the great writers of the day."

CHAPTER III.

Two months had passed. The story was progressing in a way which the author had never dreamed of when he first took up his pen to write. "A Broken Altar" was undoubtedly the novel of the year. Everyone was asking who Guy Provost was, and nobody knew. The editor was reticent on the subject, and in spite of the ceaseless efforts of the busy interviewer the secret never leaked out. And meanwhile the circulation of the paper went up by leaps and bounds. Such a boom had never been known before at the offices of the "News."

One cold clear evening early in March, Lord Worthington, with a gun under his arm and a solitary spaniel at his heels, was walking down a narrow woodland track which led from the park gates to the keeper's cottage. His whole attitude was one of despair or of deepest depression, and it was not difficult to see that his mind was occupied with thoughts of the most disagreeable and lugubrious nature. The stooping shoulders, the down-cast eyes, the heavy listless tread, all spoke of grave mental disquietude or abject misery pitiful to watch.

A young crescent moon shone down through the leafless branches of the trees. Under foot the ground was moist and sodden, and there was a certain freshness in the air which spoke of recent showers. A stile on the further side of the thick underwood was faintly visible in the deepening twilight, and turning aside from the beaten path he had been following Lord Worthington made his way towards it, and, leaning wearily against the wooden rail, he buried his face in his hands and remained apparently wrapped in meditation. Every now and then a stifled sob broke from him, and his whole frame shook.

At last, however, he seemed in some measure to regain his composure.

"What a fool I am to break down like this!" he exclaimed. "I have no one but myself to thank for all my misery. If a man must needs play with fire, he has no right to cry at a burn."

He laughed at the platitude, but it brought him no consolation or comfort. The terrible wound in his heart was too recent to be forgotten. Sitting there in the falling darkness he went over and over again the story of his misfortune, of the search after the knowledge of love—begun in jest and ending with the real and awful suffering of a broken heart.

How this passion had sprung into life he hardly understood. It had come upon him unexpectedly. Only a few days ago he was on his quest for a new experience, and Lady Evelyn was nothing more to him than a pleasant companion—an interesting psychological study. And now it had come to this! He had been sent about his business.

He thought of his newly acquired fame in the world of letters and laughed for the second time. He thought of the thousands and thousands of human beings who sympathised with his story and thought of himself—alone and friendless in the world.

. . . . . .

Late that night Lord Worthington retired to his library to write. He felt unusually disinclined for the task, but the editor was clamouring for the next instalment of his story and there was no alternative. For a long time he paced up and down the room, to and fro, to and fro, trying to collect his thoughts. Things were going very smoothly indeed with the hero of "A Broken Altar." It was as well, perhaps, that this should happen in a romance of fiction, as it so seldom did in real life. And then a new thought came to his lordship. As he had been made to suffer, others should suffer, too. The idea pleased him. He seized his pen and sat down and began to write.

He would put his character to torture just as he had been tortured that day.

And presently, as he wrote, there came to him something like relief.

CHAPTER IV.

Now it is probable that on this particular evening no one in the world was half so unhappy as the Lady Evelyn herself. From the most unfortunate and long-repented moment when Duncan Stuart had been initiated into the secret of her studio she had lived in a constant state of alarm. Unintentional as the double likeness had been, it could not be denied or overlooked, and it was quite impossible to meet Lord Worthington without wondering whether he was reading Guy Provost's story in the Illustrated London News.

The thought was sufficiently embarrassing to make her look and feel uncomfortable. No one is more conscious of guilt than the innocent.

There was some satisfaction in the reflection that he could never know who the artist was if Duncan Stuart could be trusted, but she had not the most implicit faith in that young gentleman, who had taken to chaffing her unmercifully on the subject.

In her fury she made up her mind to avoid the innocent cause of her misery as much as possible until the hateful story was finished. This, however, was easier said than done. The more she tried to escape him the more determined he appeared to see her. The meetings which had once been of rare occurrence had now become almost daily.

The evil-minded Duncan observed this and made the most of his opportunity. He pointed out that from the very day on which the first instalment of Guy Provost's story had appeared Lord Worthington's attention had become more marked. Only one thing could be deduced from that. His lordship was evidently under the impression that some mutual friend was endeavouring by this somewhat novel means to bring about a not altogether undesirable match, and was by no means loth to take the hint.

Digitized by Google

Lady Evelyn was furious.

To make matters worse, the likeness in the illustrations could not be altered. As she had begun it was necessary that she should go on to the bitter end. She had almost come to hating the unknown author of "A Broken Altar." As if she had not enough to bear already, his characters were continually meeting and talking, and behaving in a way which reminded her of sundry little incidents in her unwished-for intercourse with Lord Worthington.

And then the climax had come. Lord Worthington had taken her by surprise, and offered her his undying devotion. She refused him, of course. Under the circumstances there was nothing else to be done—and then she was sorry.

Deep down in her heart she knew that she had fallen in love with this man. When she came to think the matter over in the solitude of her bedroom, she could find nothing but the fear of what Duncan Stuart would say that had influenced her decision. A sort of numbness came over her. All that night, and for many a weary day afterwards, she suffered with horrible acuteness. All the joy and pleasure in life seemed to be gone. And there was no one to whom she could go for consolation—except Guy Provost. In the misery of the last few weeks she had almost forgotten him, and now she began to look forward to the day when the next batch of proofs would arrive in order to comfort herself by reading of the happiness which might have been hers. The hero had already made up his mind to propose. The heroine, who reminded her more than ever of herself, would, of course, accept. Considering how they loved one another this was the inevitable sequel, and in their happiness perhaps she would be able to forget for a time her own joylessness and misery.

And then the proofs came.

She read them through eagerly, almost breathlessly.

Things had come to a climax, and the hero had been sent about his business.

How sorry she was for him! A little lump rose in her throat as she read, and tears of ready sympathy stole down her cheeks. Poor fellow! How he suffered. She had never read anything so wonderful or so beautiful as this description of a broken heart before! It carried the reader away with its passion, and pathos, and eloquence! She felt her indignation rising against the heroine. The girl must be heartless and cruel and brutal to cause so much suffering!

She read the proofs over and over again until she seemed to know each word by heart. How it brought back another scene to her mind!

When she sat down at last and took up her brush her hands trembled so that she could not paint. It seemed almost sacrilege to depict such a sacred subject—besides, how could she ever do justice to the powerful, graphic words that described the exquisite emotions of the scene far better than any picture could do. Her heart failed her.

And presently, as she sat there, crying a little, a new idea came to her. Not a single word, not a line of reference had been made by the author to the feelings of his heroine. He had ignored that side of the question altogether. The girl for some secret reason had refused to marry the man whom she loved so dearly and sent him away broken-hearted. What must her sensations have been! Lady Evelyn's heart beat faster. A moment before she had been half angry with the girl. Now she was full of sympathy. A flame of inspiration touched her soul, the beautiful sorrowful face lit up with animation.

Words—the saddest, most touching words she had ever read had painted the sorrow of the man; and now she would draw a picture that would speak of the agony of the woman.

It was a theme worthy of her brush—the outpouring of a laden soul.

It was a marvellous work of art.

. . . . . .

The few weeks that have passed from the time that Lord Worthington relieved his pent-up feelings by describing the acute suffering of his disappointed love affair had not served to lessen the pain. He was as keenly sensitive as ever to the cost of Lady Evelyn's refusal. He was still indignant with himself for the ridiculous part he had played in bringing things to such a pass. At the same time he looked forward, with curiously mixed feelings, to seeing his experience—bought so dearly—in print. He was anxious, too, to see how the unknown artist, who had displayed such sympathy with his feelings before, would illustrate that scene.

The actual discovery was to be a revelation and a shock.

Here was no picture of a man soul-tormented and consumed with self-reproach.

Instead a drawing of a woman—alone—standing with arms outstretched towards the half-closed door—and on her face a look of anguish, of awful, silent suffering that thrilled and fascinated a beholder.

It was a marvellous work of art—a powerful picture, portraying the tearful longing of the heart, the dreariness of the loveless future, and the sacrifice.

Lord Worthington was deeply moved. It was an undoubted liberty on the part of the artist, but, for all that, not one that he felt at all inclined to resent. The revelation that came to him left little room for any thought of the kind—only it filled his breast with hope.

. . . .

Three months later, when Lord Worthington decided to bring out his story in book form, he naturally thought him of Miss Violet Vernon, the artist. The editor, however, on being consulted, did not think that she intended to undertake any further work; but he promised to write and lay the matter before her. Now, truth to tell, the Lady Evelyn had made up her mind never to illustrate another story. When she received the editor's letter, however, it occurred to her that by exercising a little diplomatic tact she might, without committing herself, arrange for a personal interview with Mr. Guy Provost. She was particularly anxious to meet this mysterious man who had made such a mark in the world, and to her surprise and delight it was duly arranged in the course of a few days that they were to be introduced at the offices of the Illustrated London News to discuss any further collaboration. It was not difficult to find an excuse for running up to town, but when the eventful morning came and she found herself settled down comfortably in an empty first-class carriage, who should get in at the last moment but Lord Worthington—the last person in the world she wanted to meet or see just then.

It was an embarrassing situation for both of them.

Lady Evelyn was the first to speak.

"Is it friendship?" she asked.

"Of course. How can you ask? I am afraid you must have considered my behaviour most extraordinary last time we met. I was carried away under the influence of the moment. I had no right to speak as I did."

Digitized by Google

"Shall we talk of something else?"

"I beg your pardon——" and then, with a sudden inspiration: "Have you been reading that story in the Illustrated London News?"

For the life of her Lady Evelyn could not keep back the colour that rushed to her cheeks.

"I have," she said, growing more and more uncomfortable under his scrutiny, and as the awful thought flashed across her that Duncan Stuart might have said something about the illustrations.

"And you liked it?"

"I think," she replied, "that it is the most wonderful story I have ever read."

In spite of himself Lord Worthington started a little at this candid confession. It was difficult to realise that everyone did not know so well as he did who the author was.

"I am glad you liked it," he said, "for the author is a man I know."

"Guy Provost?"

"Did you draw that picture?"

"Yes. Why shouldn't he be?"

"I did not think that you went in for such intellectual friends," she answered truthfully. Then, with a little malicious laugh, "I have fallen in love with him, you know."

. . . .

When Lady Evelyn arrived at her destination she was conducted at once to the waiting-room, where she was told that Mr. Guy Provost was expecting her.

A tall, well-built man was standing with his back to the door as she entered.

He turned round as the editor spoke.

"Mr. Provost, allow me to introduce you to Miss Violet Vernon."

The speaker vanished, and they were left alone.

"Lady Evelyn!"

"Lord Worthington!"

"Did you—did you draw that picture?"

Lady Evelyn's answer was drowned in the clatter the office-boy made darting away from the door. Those two names were worth half a sovereign to him at the office of the Star.

THROUGH VANITY

I WAS by far the happiest man in the universe when I burst into the room of my friend, Jack Townsend, the morning after my betrothal to Leila.

"Congratulate me, old boy," I said hilariously, "for in less than a month I am going to marry the prettiest girl that ever ensnared the heart of man."

I was so elated that the expression of my friend's face only dazed me for a moment. He seemed to be labouring under some mental anguish, and it was some time before he recovered himself sufficiently to reach out his hand and grasp mine in anything like a congratulatory manner.

"Of course, I wish you joy, old fellow," he said finally, "but some way the thought of matrimony for you brings a premonition of evil that frightens me a little. You know I was married once," he added, almostly abruptly, and then his pale face flushed to a brilliant red as he added fiercely, "and I would rather see you dead this moment than know you must go through the horror of my short experience."

I said nothing, but I was deeply concerned at the passionate reminiscences I had awakened. After a moment's silence my friend seemed to recover his composure.

"Sit down Phil," he said, more gently; and as I dropped into a chair, beside the fire he drew another towards me and laid his hand upon my knee.

"Let me tell you the story of my wedded life, old fellow. It will be a relief to me to speak of it, and it may perhaps be the means of putting you on your guard against woman's greatest of all weaknesses, her foolish vanity.

"When I married Vera, ten years ago, I was moderately wealthy. I knew that with judicious handling my income would keep us in comfort, if not in luxury. I explained this to my wife before we were married, and considered her apparent indifference on the subject as another proof of her unselfish love for me. She was but little more than a child and beautiful as an angel, and at first her delight at a new jewel or a flower seemed to me the very personification of childish innocence.

"It was months before I began to realise the full extent of my darling's vanity, and then, with a shudder, I saw how much her love of dress had cost me. Gradually I had squandered everything I possessed, but even in the face of bankruptcy itself I did not regret my folly until the change in Vera's nature began to show itself.

"The first wish of hers that I was obliged to thwart from lack of funds brought forth a shower of tears that nearly drove me to distraction. The second refusal deluged me in a perfect storm of reproaches and bitter words, and the last time I was forced to deny her some costly gem she turned upon me with a brazen face and vowed that she would have her wish even if some other man's funds were drawn upon to purchase it.

"I was horrified at this avowal, made, as I was obliged to admit, with the practised sang froid of an old adventuress, but when she appeared before me a few days later with the costly pin flashing in the braids of her golden hair, there was nothing left for me but to protect my honour before it was destroyed entirely.

"I gave her half of what was left, and then absented myself from home to spare myself the pain of parting. A week later I entered the house only to find that she had ruined me completely, for, not satisfied with wrecking my life, she had marred and destroyed my home until the place was hardly recognisable.

"I never attempted to secure a divorce. The whole affair was too bitterly painful, and the next thing that I heard of Vera was that she was living in Paris."

When my friend stopped speaking, I seized his hand and pressed it warmly. "Such an experience as that is enough to lose a man his soul," I said, with feeling. My friend bowed his head and gazed abstractedly into the fire, and at last I rose to go. "I thank you for telling me that story, Jack," I said slowly, "for while I find it impossible to anticipate anything so dreadful in my coming union, still, Leila is young and beautiful, and, as you say, vanity in woman is a dangerous sin, and one which every loving husband should try at once to conquer or eradicate."

Digitized by Google

An hour later I left my friend alone with his sorrow, and, only a short month after, Leila and I were wed and began our honeymoon by travelling about the Continent.

To describe my wife's beauty would have been, to me, almost impossible. To even dream of picturing her dainty, girlish manners, would seem the acme of absurdity. She was absolutely perfect in face and nature, and the joy with which she received and wore my simple offerings convinced me that, as yet, her soul was free from the taint of pride and vanity.

She should be jealously guarded against this greatest sin of woman, and in protecting her against temptation I would be protecting myself against an agony of spirit such as I had clearly seen portrayed during the last memorable call upon my friend Jack Townsend.

One day at Paris we were passing a jeweller's window, and for the first time in our married life Leila asked me for a tiny diamond. Naturally, I had no wish to refuse so trifling a thing, and although Jack's warning flashed opportunely through my mind on each occasion, I soon found myself eagerly buying every trinket that my imperious but always loving little wife saw fit to covet or admire.

One day I determined to bring this to an end. I had been looking over my finances, and found, not that I was in any great danger of bankruptcy, but that in order to complete our trip as economically as I had planned I must refrain from purchasing more of those useless things that gave my wife but a moment's pleasure. As if to test my late resolve, Leila entered at that moment and flung her arms tenderly round my neck.

"Oh, Philippe," she whispered, with a coaxing pout, "I have just seen the loveliest diamond bracelet, which M. Le Madeau says would look so charmingly upon my arm! Do buy it for me, Philippe, dear; you will make your little wife so happy."

"How many diamonds have you now, sweetheart?" I said laughingly, for I dreaded to hurt her feelings after all.

"More than the Countess G——, and almost as many as the Duchess of W——," she responded quickly and with flashing eyes.

I was completely astonished by her unexpected answer.

"Then you must have jewels that I have not seen," I responded, "for the Countess's are valued at £10,000, and the Duchess of W—— has the finest collection in all Paris!"

Leila blushed scarlet and bit her lips angrily, as if to punish them for telling tales. "I—I had some given me long ago," said she timidly. "I never told you of them because I did not know how you would feel about it. They were given me by an old admirer when I was quite a child," she added, with an attempt at candidness.

"And now you wish for this bracelet," I said coldly, for I was beginning to feel sick at heart, and the horror of my friend's fatal experience seemed duplicating itself in mine.

"Yes, please, Philippe," my wife said brightly. "I must have the bracelet, for it is the only one of its kind in Paris."

I put her from me with an angry gesture almost before she had finished her emphatic words. "You will have to do without the bracelet, Leila," I said decidedly, "for I cannot afford to buy it for you!"

Almost in fury she looked into my face. "Is it possible that I have married a pauper?" she hissed between her sharp, white teeth.

I seized my hat and left the room, and the next day, without consulting my wife in any particular, I returned with her to London. There was nothing further said between us regarding the bracelet or her insulting words, but before leaving Paris I wired Jack Townsend to meet me at Victoria, and as we slowly moved into the station, the first face that I recognised among the crowd was the friendly one of my boyhood chum, as he wrung my hand in an honest welcome home.

Just then I was astonished to see him turn suddenly pale, and with one furious glance at my wife, spring hastily into a waiting cab and drive away without a word.

In a moment the whole horrible truth was revealed to me with merciless plainness. I glanced at my wife—mine or Jack's, I knew not which—and read a confirmation of the truth in the bold indifference that seemed suddenly to be stamped upon her face.

Without a word I placed her in a cab; then, wordless still, we drove to the Métropole; and, after seeing her safely in the room, I turned without a backward glance, and went frantically to seek Jack Townsend. I found him pacing his floor like an angry lion. "Jack, old fellow!" I cried, with tears in my eyes, as I burst into the room, "Jack, I never dreamed who that woman was! Forgive me, for I have wronged you in very innocence, and, oh, Jack, old fellow, be as merciful as you can, for I, too, am suffering torments, and that alone should keep our hearts together."

There were tears also in my old chum's eyes as he turned impulsively and took me by the hand. "Sit down, Phil," he said, with an attempt at calmness, "and together we will talk over what it is best to do, for in this terrible revelation I can see that our friendship must be anger-proof or ignored for ever."

. . . . . .

Five minutes after her husband left her side Leila walked deliberately across the room and looked at herself in the massive mirror.

"Your two husbands are comparing notes," she said, with a mischievous smile at her own face in the glass, "and there is nothing left for you to do but improve the present moment to escape them."

Then she glanced hastily about the apartment and scribbled something upon a card.

"Send these trunks to this address," she said to a porter who answered her summons. Then, when he had gone, she walked back once more and raised her shapely arm before the mirror.

There was the flash and glitter of diamonds upon her wrist, and the sight restored her girlish pleasure. "I have the bracelet in spite of you, Philippe," she said gleefully. Then she made a mocking bow before the glass, and, walking backwards, caught the last reflection.

"Thank goodness, the Count has followed me!" she whispered as she left the room, "for he of all my so-called friends seems to delight in decking and admiring me in all the costliest jewels."

Four days later two gentlemen passing by a large hotel were called to attend a distressing scene. Murder had been committed in a private room; and the old Frenchman, who muttered and mumbled some unintelligible gibberish as he danced about, still flourishing the bloody weapon, was promptly taken to a place of safety, away from the presence of the dead.

Jack Townsend was the first to bend above the lovely form with a glance of pity and remorse, but it was Phil who touched the silent lips, and turning, with great tears upon his cheeks, cried: "Jack, forgive her, even as I, for after all her sin was caused by woman's weakness—vanity."

PLANK DOWN YOUR TANNER.

And in return you will get No. 9 of PEARSON'S LIBRARY, a complete novel, entitled—

"A BITTER INHERITANCE,"

By EDRIC VREDENBURGH,

with numerous full-page illustrations. This fascinating novel extends to 224 pages, and is of such enthralling interest that you will want to finish it off at one sitting. Ask for No. 9 of PEARSON'S LIBRARY, and see that you get it.

Digitized by Google

By John K. Leys, Author of "In the Toils," "My Hindoo Friend," &c., &c.—Illustrated by Raymond Potter.

CHAPTER XXIII.

On a New Trail.

Geoffrey Dundas did not lose sight of Captain Byngham, on the night of that gentleman's visit to the Hindoos' quarters at Lancaster House, till he had seen him safely landed at his hotel. Why he followed him, he would have found it hard to explain. Sometimes he entertained a half-formed idea, that on reaching the Captain's lodgings or hotel, he would send up his name, insist on seeing him, and then tell him that he was aware of his visit to Lancaster House, and demand an explanation. But soon he perceived the absolute futility of such a proceeding.

If the Captain were scoundrel enough to join in a conspiracy with the Hindoos, he would be capable of telling any number of lies, and of making any number of promises, without the slightest intention of keeping any one of them. To accuse the man to his face, and quarrel with him, could do no possible good. The only result would be to put Byngham and his fellow-conspirators thoroughly on their guard.

It was not till the hansom in which Geoffrey was following Byngham's cab had accomplished half of its journey to the Strand, that it occurred to Dundas that it might pay better to keep a watch on the Captain, though he was only an instrument in the hands of wilier men, than to look after the Hindoos themselves.

To follow them about would be impossible, since there were so many of them; and it was not likely that anything further could be learned at Lancaster House, since the adjoining house was now in the hands of the enemy. Besides, the scraps of conversation which he had overheard had made it plain to Geoffrey that Captain Byngham was to play a leading part in the plot which was on foot. Byngham, then, would be sure to be on the spot at the critical moment. If his attack could be parried, the plot must fail.

Geoffrey Dundas did not lose sight of Captain Byngham.

So argued Geoffrey, and in pursuance of his new resolution he stopped his cab when he saw the one which contained Captain Byngham pass through the gates leading to the Charing Cross Railway Station.

"Is he going somewhere by train?" thought Geoffrey to himself. "It will be awkward for me to start on a journey at his heels, without so much as a clean collar, and with only thirty shillings in my purse!"

It was a false alarm, however. Byngham's cab made for the hotel entrance, and there the Captain alighted. After waiting a few minutes Dundas followed him into the building, and having ascertained that Captain Byngham was staying there, he engaged a bedroom. He then went to the Temple, packed a portmanteau, and took it with him to the hotel so that he might be ready to start off anywhere at a moment's notice.

Arrived at the hotel, Geoffrey's first care was to ascertain Captain Byngham's number. It was 59. Geoffrey then sent for the head-porter, gave him half-a-sovereign, and promised to make it a whole one if he would let him know when No. 59 gave indications that he was about to leave.

As no one could quit the place without this man's knowledge, Geoffrey felt tolerably easy in his mind. He wrote to General Chetwynd that night; and next day he ventured to stay away from the hotel long enough to do a little shopping. He bought, among other things, a revolver and a supply of cartridges, for he thought it more than likely that they would be of use before the business in hand was ended. He also called on his friend Linton, and told him what he had discovered, and what he was doing.

"Let me come with you, Dundas!" cried Linton impulsively. "I am no genius, but two heads, they say, are better than one."

"You're awfully good, old man," returned Geoffrey, "but I won't take you out of town until I find out something more definite. For my present rôle of detective—which I hate, and for which I am about as well fitted as an elephant on stilts—I think it would hardly do to have a companion."

"Perhaps you are right," said Linton. "At any rate, you will not hesitate to summon me if I can be of any use—even if it should be only in the way of providing someone you can talk to. I might be of use in that way, if in no other."

Geoffrey thanked him warmly, and promised that he would write to him the moment he was in need of help.

Two days after this, the head-porter told Geoffrey that the gentleman in No. 59, was leaving next morning. To follow Captain Byngham's cab was, with the head-porter's assistance, an easy matter. The cabman received the necessary instructions, and carried them out faithfully. In a few minutes Geoffrey found himself at Victoria.

The Continental train was about to start, and Geoffrey took a ticket for Paris. It was with some hesitancy that he did this, for he thought it most likely, that Captain Byngham was merely going to the French capital for a few days' change and amusement.

Digitized by Google

There were very few people on the platform.

However, it turned out that this guess was wrong. To Geoffrey's surprise, Captain Byngham did not go on to Paris after arriving at Calais, but waited at the station some little time, and then got on board a local train. With some difficulty, Dundas followed him, unobserved indeed, but without a proper ticket, for he could not ascertain where the Captain meant to alight. He had therefore got one for a station a few miles down the line, so as to be able to enter the train.

His object now was to find out when Captain Byngham left the train, and this was for Geoffrey, who was entirely unused to such work, an unpleasant and a difficult task. He succeeded, however, beyond his hopes.

It soon became evident that the railway skirted part of the Normandy coast; and at Asnières, a little watering-place some three hours from Calais, the Captain alighted.

There were very few people on the platform, so few that Geoffrey felt certain that the Captain would see and recognise him the moment he stepped out of the carriage; and even if, by any chance, he should fail to do so, the little fracas that would be sure to arise when it was discovered that Geoffrey had been travelling without a proper ticket, would certainly lead to his being noticed.

Now it was to Geoffrey's mind essential that the Captain should be quite unsuspicious of the fact that he was being watched. So, after a moment's consideration, Geoffrey decided to keep his seat. He went on to the next station, then got out, paid his excess fare without demur, and then took the next train back to Asnières, where he arrived about two hours and a half after Byngham had been left there.

Geoffrey made sure that he would find the man he was shadowing at one of the hotels. It turned out that there was but one hotel—a huge, brand-new structure, still smelling of bricks and mortar, called L'Hôtel de l'Europe.

But at this hostelry Captain Byngham could not be found. There had been an Englishman there for lunch, the head waiter informed Geoffrey; but he had not brought any luggage, nor had he engaged a bedroom. Geoffrey concluded that Byngham must have friends in the place with whom he meant to stay. At any rate, the place was so small that it seemed certain that no one could hide in it.

Geoffrey felt certain that if the Captain stayed in the town he would meet him sooner or later. The worst of it was that there was nearly as much chance of Byngham being the first to see him as there was of his being the first to see Captain Byngham. That, however, could not be helped.

As it seemed tolerably certain that the Captain meant to stay some days in the town, and the hotel proved to be somewhat expensive, Geoffrey hunted about for rooms, and found what he wanted in a small villa, nearly the last of a long row of detached houses which fringed the shore to the eastward. The villa belonged to a widow named Fresual.

She had two sons and two daughters. The elder son, Jacques, was a petty officer in the French navy, just then at nome on leave—a fine, frank, manly fellow. The younger, Ernest, made a living by hiring out pleasure boats. The two girls helped their mother in the house-work.

The morning after Geoffrey took up his abode with Madame Fresual, as he was standing at the window of his sitting-room after breakfast, he saw, to his surprise, the very man he was so anxious to find, walking along the sands, between him and the sea.

As he carried a pair of towels in his hands it was evident that the Captain had been for his morning dip. But where could he be going? There was but one house further on in that direction. Perhaps he was merely taking a constitutional after his swim? No; he went straight up to the little gate in the railing that fenced in the garden of the next house from the sands, opened it, and walked up the garden path as if he were at home.

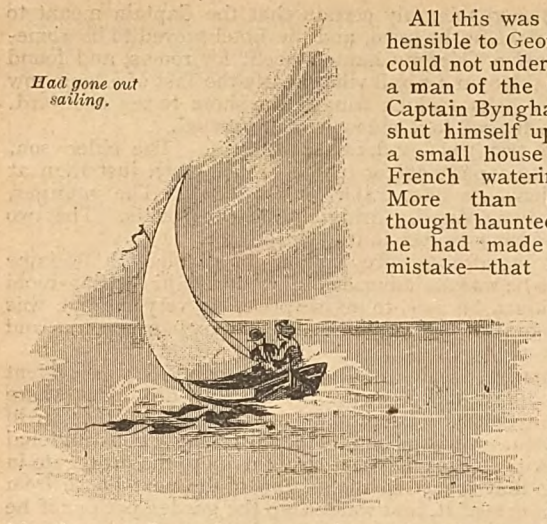
"Ah!" said Geoffrey to himself, "I am lucky. The Captain has taken rooms as I have done. I shall be able to keep an eye on him comfortably."

He put a few questions, however, to his landlady, and found that he was not quite right in his conjecture. M. Prébost, who leased the last house of the row, did not let rooms. He let the house furnished for the summer months, and lived in it himself during the winter. But Madame Fresual had not heard that M. Prébost had found a tenant. She could easily find out, though; for it happened that she knew the widow Coquelin, M. Prébost's housekeeper, very well.

Madame Fresual was as good as her word. She was soon able to report to Geoffrey that the Villa Carnot (as M. Prébost had named his dwelling) had been let for a month, to a compatriot of Monsieur's. There was no doubt about the fact, since the widow Coquelin, her informant, acted as housekeeper and cook to the new tenant. She did not sleep in the house, but went in the morning, and returned to her own cottage later in the day. Generally, the Englishman dined at a café; so the widow had decidedly an easy time of it.

He went straight up to the little gate.

Digitized by Google



Had gone out sailing.

All this was incomprehensible to Geoffrey. He could not understand why a man of the world like Captain Byngham, should shut himself up alone in a small house in a dull French watering-place. More than once the thought haunted him that he had made a grand mistake—that the Captain had merely come here to economise, or to recruit his health; and that he, himself, was wasting his time, and staying away from his friends at the very moment when he might have been of service to them.

The General's letter re-assured him on this latter point. He could not possibly have maintained a watch over Leila and her father, while they were on board Lord Lavington's yacht. And he could not deny that Sir Arthur's reasons for not altering his arrangements, seemed sound. Yet he was haunted by a vague uneasiness.

As the Tenth of June drew near, this indefinable sense of impending evil increased. The very inaction of his life tended to make Geoffrey nervous and apprehensive. During the first week of his stay at Madame Fresual's, he had gone out sailing a good deal with Jacques Fresual, to whom he had taken a strong liking, in one of his brother's boats.

It was tolerably safe to do this, as Captain Byngham had discovered a casino in the town—few seaside places in France are without one or more of these establishments—and spent the greater part of his time at the roulette table.

But now, Geoffrey did not dare to go a mile away from the town. He became morbidly afraid of letting Captain Byngham escape from his surveillance, and at the same time morbidly anxious lest he should let the Captain know that he was being watched. This, of itself, was enough to make him wretched; and he was constantly tormented by the fear that Leila might be in danger on the coming Tenth of June, without his being at hand to defend her. He became nervous, depressed, and gloomily apprehensive of the future.

At length, one day he telegraphed to Linton, begging him to come and keep him company for a few days, if he could leave town.

Next day, Jack Linton arrived at Asnières. Geoffrey met him at the station.

"I shall never forget your goodness in coming to me now," said Geoffrey, as he grasped his chum's hand. "That fellow is still here. He spends his days and half his nights at the gaming-table, and it seems useless my staying on here. I can do no good."

"You can do no harm, at all events," answered Linton; "and I quite think that after what you heard at Lancaster House, you should keep an eye on our fat friend. You have let yourself get over anxious. I'll take your place to-morrow, and see that Byngham doesn't make a bolt of it, while you take a twenty mile walk. It will do you a world of good."

CHAPTER XXIV.

Geoffrey and his Friend Play a Bold Stroke.

Linton's presence acted like a charm upon his friend. The cloud that had been hanging over Geoffrey's mind vanished. The sense of bewilderment and hopelessness, which for some days had weighed down his spirits, disappeared. He was his own man again.

It had been a dull, threatening day. The sun set in an angry sky that glowed in the west like burnished copper, while a thick band of dark purple clouds hung over the reddish-yellow light, as if they were intent on crushing it out in darkness.

"It's going to be a stormy night," said Geoffrey to his friend Jacques Fresual, as he passed him in the garden.

The sailor took a look seaward, and answered "Oui, monsieur. Soon now, in two hours or less, it will blow heavily—what you call hard."

Captain Byngham had gone home about six o'clock, and had not stirred out since; so the two friends thought they might safely smoke a cigar on the sands after dinner. It was already dusk, and would soon be quite dark. If the Captain left his house they would be sure to observe him, while they would be seen by him, perhaps, but could not possibly be recognised.

The wind spoilt the cigars which the two young men were smoking, and brought them to an untimely end; but they continued to pace the sands arm in arm, sometimes going a considerable way in the direction of the town, sometimes extending their beat a few yards beyond the Villa Carnot.

A drizzling rain began to fall, and Linton was just proposing that they should go indoors, when Geoffrey, grasping his friend's arm, said:

"I say, what's that?"

A bright light suddenly shone out from the loftiest of the windows of the Villa Carnot which looked seaward. It seemed as if a lamp had been placed in the window, and—what was more singular still—in a few moments a second lamp (or a candle strengthened by a reflector) was placed above the first, the two being in a perpendicular line.

"Looks like a signal," said Geoffrey.

"Doesn't it?"

"What can it mean?"

"It can only mean that the gallant Captain has friends out there, and that he is trying to attract their attention, or to convey some message to them."

"Or they may be sending a boat ashore; and the lamps may be placed there as a guide"

"True. I propose that we stay here and await developments."

They both gazed out to sea; but it was pitch dark, and a driving rain was falling. Even if a ship were there, near

A bright light suddenly shone out.

Digitized by Google

enough to be visible by daylight, it was quite impossible to see it. They could only wait.

"You have not forgotten the date, I suppose?" said Geoffrey in a low voice to his friend.

"The date?"

"Yes This is the ninth. To-morrow is the Tenth of June!"

"Ah!"

Nothing stirred within the Villa Carnot. There was no sound but the soft crashing of the waves on the pebbly beach; nothing visible but the lamp-signal close by.

"I can't stand this," cried Geoffrey, after they had waited patiently for, perhaps, a quarter of an hour. "Let us get a little nearer to the house, and find out, if we can, what the Captain is about."

As they were in the act of doing so, the house door opened, and a figure appeared, clad in an ulster that reached down to the heels. It was Captain Byngham.

The two friends stood still. They were in the thick belt of darkness that lay beyond the illuminated streak. He could not see them, but he remained perfectly visible to them as he stood at the open door of the house gazing seaward. He passed slowly down the garden-path, his hands deep in the pockets of his ulster, and the collar turned up to his ears, for it was still raining, then down the beach to the water's edge. He stood there for a while without moving, and then slowly retraced his steps.

"Let me alone; I must speak to him," said Geoffrey in a whisper to his friend. He had gone up close to the garden gate, so that he would be right in Captain Byngham's path as he returned to the house. Linton, knowing that his friend's impulsive disposition sometimes led him to act imprudently, had put his hand on Geoffrey's arm to pull him back into the shadow, but Geoffrey shook off his grasp.

"I mean to be at the bottom of this!" he said between his teeth.

Byngham paid no attention to the tall man that stood beside the gate—took him, probably, for some tourist who had lost his way.

"Captain Byngham!"

The Captain gave a start of fear rather than surprise. His face, which Linton saw clearly in the light from the open door and the lamps in the window above, was as white as marble.

"I—I thought you were dead!" he stammered out at last. "You were said to have been killed among the Welsh mountains. How did you come here? Won't you—er—that is, I suppose you are staying at the hotel?"

"I am staying here for the present. And you?"

"Oh, I only came down from Paris yesterday. Staying with some friends here. I fancy I shall be gone in a day or two."

"That is not true. You came here a fortnight ago, under the instructions of those murderous Hindoos. And to-night, the eve of the Tenth of June, I find you displaying a signal in your window. What is the meaning of those lamps?"

The Captain had started violently when Geoffrey uttered the word "Hindoos;" but he recovered himself in a second.

"I ask you—what is the meaning of these lamps?" repeated Geoffrey, without raising his voice a semi-tone. "Are they meant for a signal? If so, to whom?"

"Confound you! Mind your own business!"

"It is my business; and I mean to mind it. Are you expecting any visitors to-night? I saw you go down to the beach."

"Curse you, you sneaking cur! Do you imagine I shall tell you one iota about my affairs? Get away, and leave me alone, or it will be the worse for you."

"That is precisely what I shall not do. I shall not leave your side this night till I know the reason of your presence in this out-of-the-way French town, and the reason of your making those signals in your window to-night. I give you warning that I shall watch for you outside your door, and follow you wherever you go this night."

Captain Byngham had never been accustomed to restrain his temper, and he had a very strong sense of his own dignity. More even than the threatened frustration of the scheme he had on hand, he resented the indignity with which he was menaced.

Without a word, without so much as a gesture of warning, he lifted his fist, drew it back, and struck Geoffrey full upon the temple. The blow was swift and sudden as a lightning flash. Geoffrey fell, and lay as motionless as if he had been struck by a thunderbolt.

But when Linton seized the Captain by the collar, crying out: "You cowardly rascal, to take a man unawares like that!" the noise and trampling of the struggle soon roused him. He sat up, then sprang to his feet, and seized one of the Captain's arms, while Linton clung fast to the other.

"Let me go, you ruffians!" shouted the Captain, struggling violently in their grasp. "I will give information to the police, and get you three months' hard labour for this night's work."

"I fancy you have more to fear from an appeal to the law than we have," said Geoffrey significantly. "What shall we do with him?" he added to Linton.

The question was not an easy one to answer; but plainly it was imperative that Byngham should be prevented from warning the people whom he was evidently expecting. Something, Geoffrey thought, might be learned from them, if they could be met and questioned before Byngham could exchange a syllable with them.

"Let us shut him up in his own cellar," said Linton at last.

"The very thing!" cried Geoffrey; and they proceeded to carry their prisoner up to the house. He offered a stout resistance, and (forgetting that he was in a foreign country) shouted "Police!" at the top of his voice. But no answer came. No one was likely to be abroad on that solitary shore on a dark, wet night. Captain Byngham was carried into his own house; and there his captors proceeded to tie his wrists and ankles with their pocket-handkerchiefs, pending a more secure set of fastenings.

As it turned out, the house had no cellar; so Geoffrey and Linton placed their captive in a chair in his sitting-room, and bound him to it with some trunk-straps, which they found upstairs.

The Captain struggled violently, but when he found that his efforts were useless, he remained perfectly still. All the time he did not utter one word.

"Now listen to me," said Geoffrey. "It is necessary that we should see the persons you are expecting to come ashore and question them. You must not interfere in any way. If you give me your word of honour not to call out to them—not to cry out at all till we come to release you—I will not gag you. I should be sorry to do that."

Here Linton touched Geoffrey, as much as to say that he did not approve of his running this risk. But Geoffrey paid no heed to him.

"What do you say?" he continued. "Will you give me your parole to keep quiet?"

"Yes."

"That will do. We will not keep you in this uncomfortable state longer than we can help. Come, Linton!"

They left him there, and went down to the beach, leaving the signal lamps burning.

(To be continued.)

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR

Now on sale at PEARSON'S WEEKLY Offices, and at all leading booksellers' and bookstalls.

In one handsome volume, 8vo, 375 pages, uniform with "THE ANGEL OF THE REVOLUTION" and "OLGA ROMANOFF," with profuse Illustrations.

Digitized by Google

A HAIRBREADTH ESCAPE

In 1870, a month or two before the outbreak of the Franco-German war, one of the most promising cadets, or, as they are commonly styled "pupils," of the military college of St. Cyr was Gaston de Langeais. He was the last representative of an ancient family in Brittany, whose traditional obstinacy and impatience of control he had inherited to an extent which rendered him more popular with his comrades than with the presiding authorities.

Gifted by nature with an abundance of luxuriantly curling hair, of which he was inordinately vain, the prescribed necessity of having it cropped short was a perpetual grievance to him; and he looked anxiously forward to his second year at St. Cyr, and to his emancipation from the too close scrutiny to which he had hitherto been periodically subjected.

"In two months," he said exultingly to one of his intimates, "my time here will be up, and once named 'officer' I shall be free as air, and no longer ashamed to show myself to my cousin Louise. For you see," he added, lifting his cap, and displaying a thick growth of short curls carefully flattened down, "I still have some hair left."

Castles in the air, however, are apt to collapse; and Gaston's visionary projects were, to say the least, premature.

A few mornings later at the hour of parade, the corps of youngsters were unexpectedly summoned to undergo the inspection of the infantry lieutenant, Bouchard, a lynx-eyed martinet, by no means favourably disposed towards pupils destined for cavalry regiments, whom he contemptuously designated as "coxcombs."

De Langeais, as the recognised leader of the band, was particularly obnoxious to him; and his keen eye twinkled maliciously as he stopped short before the young man and examined him curiously.

"Take off your cap," he said.

Gaston obeyed with an inward shiver of apprehension.

"I thought as much," growled the lieutenant. "If that superfluous hair has not disappeared by this time to-morrow you will pass the next four days in the 'salle de police.'"

"You are in for it now," whispered his sympathising comrade when the terrible Bouchard had passed on.

"Not a bit of it," replied De Langeais, shrugging his shoulders unconcernedly.

"Why, what on earth can you do?"

"I don't exactly know; but I intend to put off the evil day as long as I possibly can."

Next morning, with the aid of a couple of brushes, well soaked in water, he succeeded in levelling the rebellious locks so as to deceive even a practised eye, and appeared on parade with his wonted jaunty air, although not a little nervous as to the result of the coming ordeal. Presently the lieutenant with an ominously slow step, and pausing, as before, exactly in front of Gaston, repeated the order of the previous day:

"Take off your cap."

For a moment Bouchard appeared puzzled by the apparently smooth surface of the "pupil's" head, but bent on ascertaining the real state of the case, he unceremoniously lifted a portion of the flattened hair with his forefinger, thereby disclosing a substratum of tiny curls. Then, turning to the adjutant who accompanied him, he briefly consigned the offender for four days to the "salle de police," and continued his round of inspection with a self-satisfied grin.

During the last day of his seclusion Gaston practically employed his leisure in decorating his knee, by a judicious mixture of blue and green paint, with a tolerably exact imitation of a bruise, which he showed to the regimental doctor, pretending that the contusion had been caused by his coming in contact with a post in the riding-school.

Whether he implicitly believed the statement or not, the good-natured medico put him on the sick list, and thus twenty-four hours were gained. His reappearance on parade, however, became at length a matter of necessity, and this time his continued disobedience entailed on him a week's further confinement, at the expiration of which he was again consigned to durance vile for an entire fortnight.

"This will never do," thought De Langeais. "The earthenware pot must in the long run be smashed by the iron one, and I shall have to give in at last. I had better try old Grison once more."

Whereupon, having previously by way of precaution added a few touches to the pictorial embellishment of his knee, he limped into the consulting room of Dr. Grison, who was fortunately too much engaged with other patients to bestow more than a very cursory glance at the bruise, and not knowing what to make of the case, gave the newcomer an order of admission to the infirmary, then under the charge of half a dozen Sisters of Charity, presided over by a lady superior.

Gaston had hardly changed his ordinary attire for the regulation loose grey coat and cotton night-cap, when Pitrot, the tonsor of the establishment, was announced, bearing an enormous pair of scissors and a laconic note which ran as follows:—

"The pupil De Langeais' hair to be cut off immediately.

"BOUCHARD."

The poor coiffeur, unwilling to lose so excellent a customer for pomade and other capillary unguents, and yet compelled to obey the imperative mandate, was in despair.

"Would it not be possible, monsieur," he suggested, "to obtain from the lady superior a certificate that the effect of the operation might be injurious to an invalid?"

Gaston could not help smiling at the idea. "I don't quite see," he said, "what a cropped head has to do with a bruise on the knee, but there can be no harm in trying."

As good luck would have it, Sister Angelique, in whose memory, perhaps, still lingered the fondly cherished recollection of some romantic episode of her youthful days, listened with interest to the handsome Breton, while he related to her his hopes and fears, and his attachment to his cousin Louise. Being naturally kind-hearted and sympathetic, she agreed without much persuasion to his rather incongruous request, so that Pere Pitrot, relieved from his disagreeable responsibility, went on his way rejoicing.

A quarter of an hour later the lieutenant burst into the infirmary in a paroxysm of fury.

"So, youngster!" he cried, "it seems you are bent on braving me! Well, we shall see. You cannot stay shamming here for ever; and, mark my words . . . when you do come out, I'll have that head of yours as smooth as a billiard ball!"

With this parting threat he bounced out of the room, and next day every one of the future cavalry officers—the prisoner alone excepted—underwent the summary operation of "cropping" at the hands of the tonsor, Pitrot.

Meanwhile, Gaston's position was by no means an enviable one. Through the grated windows of the infirmary he could see his comrades mounting their horses in the courtyard, and caracoling gaily as they passed, and on Sundays—most painful trial of all—could hear with a pang of envy the joyous shouts of his more fortunate colleagues, emancipated for a few hours from duty, and on their way to catch the first train to Paris.

The day of deliverance, however, was at hand. Early on the 14th of July—a date never to be forgotten by De Langeais—the occupants of the infirmary were suddenly startled by a tremendous uproar immediately under their windows, and, on looking out, imagined for a moment that pandemonium had broken loose.

Digitized by Google

Such a spectacle had assuredly never been witnessed at St. Cyr. The entire quadrangle was thronged by an excited multitude, rushing to and fro in tumultuous disorder, flinging their caps high in the air, and bursting every now and then into a loud and prolonged hurrah! Was it a revolt, marvelled the sisters and their patients; or what could it possibly mean?

A few minutes sufficed to explain the mystery. A hasty step was heard outside the door, immediately followed by the entrance into the sick room of an adjutant, bearing in his hand an official document, the contents of which, recited by him in a sonorous voice, were greeted with an enthusiasm bordering on frenzy.

"War is declared with Prussia. By Imperial decree, the seniors are henceforth sub-lieutenants."

Before the sisters, deafened by the clamour, had recovered from their stupefaction, they found themselves alone in the infirmary, the invalids, one and all, having mustered strength enough to throw aside their wraps and make the best of their way downstairs.

Each of the seniors entitled to promotion having notified to the adjutant on duty the regiment to which he was desirous of being attached, the preparations for departure were speedily completed. At an early hour in the afternoon the band of exulting youngsters started for Paris, intent on making the most of the three days allowed them before joining their respective corps.

Gaston's regiment being stationed at Lilie, he had ample leisure, after partaking of a farewell repast at Brebant's with his old companions, to carry into execution his long-cherished project of paying a flying visit to his cousin Louise at Trouville; and, repairing on the third day to headquarters, reported himself to the colonel of the Forty-second Dragoons, who received him most cordially.

"You are dispensed from duty," said his chief, "until you have got your kit in order. Ma foi, young man, you have arrived in the very nick of time, for before the week is out we shall be on our way to the front."

On his first appearance at mess, De Langeais discovered to his astonishment that every one of his new companions, without exception, was closely cropped. "A very necessary precaution," said the president, "in war time; the less encumbrance we carry about us the better. A long beard and as little hair as possible; no comb or razor wanted, nothing but a simple 'brush up.'"

"Not to mention," chimed in an old campaigner of proverbial baldness, "that a heavy helmet plays the very deuce with one's hair."

Gaston listened with due respect to these well-meant exhortations, but without the slightest intention of being influenced by them; and, on the arrival of his division at Metz some days later, had already, more than once, declined to avail himself of the services of the regimental barber.

Nevertheless, he instinctively felt that a continued refusal to conform to the general custom must inevitably endanger his popularity, and that the only way to atone for this obnoxious singularity was to distinguish himself by some exploit which might obtain for him an honourable mention in the order of the day.

An opportunity soon came. On the 18th of August his regiment, posted near St. Privat, behind an avenue of poplars bordering the road to Saarbruck, had been exposed for several hours to a galling fire of the German artillery, and had suffered severely from an incessant storm of shells, which were beginning to set the trees on fire.

The position of the French corps became untenable, and the colonel, deciding that the enemy's guns must at any cost be silenced, ordered a small detachment of dragoons commanded by De Langeais to charge, and cut them off from the main body.

The Germans, taken by surprise and imagining they were about to be attacked by the entire regiment, ceased firing and hastily retreated, leaving one of their guns on the field, which Gaston, at the head of fifteen men, bore down upon, and, sabring the gunners, carried it triumphantly into the French lines.

"Bravo!" cried the colonel, warmly grasping the young sub-lieutenant's hand; "you have deserved the cross for this, and I will take care that you get it."

Stimulated by this first success, and eager to justify by some further act of daring the good opinion of his chief, De Langeais, neglected no opportunity of proving himself worthy of it. Dispatched on a foraging expedition and attacked by an outpost of infantry, he completely routed them and brought ten prisoners into the camp, and a few days later held his ground for half an hour, unsupported save by his own men, against an entire corps of the enemy.

His gallantry did not pass unrewarded. Not only was the Cross of the Legion of Honour conferred on him, but his name was three times mentioned for exceptional bravery in the order of the day, and his speedy promotion to the rank of lieutenant was generally regarded as a certainty.

At this juncture the unexpected capitulation of Metz was a severe blow to him, and, unwilling to accept comparative liberty on parole, he conceived a project which, although extremely hazardous, might enable him to join the Army of the Loire. His design being approved by the general commanding under Bazaine, who intrusted him with a letter to his colleague, Aurelle de Paladines, informing him that the army of Prince Frederick Charles would shortly march towards the Loire. Gaston exchanged his uniform for a blouse and a peasant's straw hat, and, carrying a basket of eggs, pursued his way in the direction of the enemy's lines.

"It is a terrible task," he thought, "but better be shot at once than rot in a German prison."

Challenged by the first man he met, and arrested on suspicion, he was taken before the colonel of the regiment, who, surrounded by his officers in council, scrutinised the prisoner attentively.

"Where do you come from?" he inquired in tolerable French.

"From Ladonchamps, on my way with these eggs to Grige," was the young man's reply.

"Are you aware that you run the risk of being treated as a spy?" pursued his interrogator.

"Necessity has no choice," retorted De Langeais, with a perfectly indifferent air.

During this brief colloquy the officers glanced curiously at the stalwart individual before them, and were almost unanimously of the colonel's openly expressed opinion that he was no peasant, but an officer in disguise, and consequently a spy. A pause boding no good to the accused ensued, and in another moment his fate would have been sealed, when a grey-haired major who had been intently gazing at De Langeais suddenly rose from his seat.

"Stay," he exclaimed, "with all submission, I think you are mistaken. This man, whoever he may be, is no officer. All those we have taken prisoners have been close cropped, and no one ever heard of a French soldier on active service with such a head of hair as that."

"True, the major is right," assented several of those present.

"It may be so," said the colonel, only half convinced, "and in that case he is entitled to the benefit of the doubt. Give him a pass and let him go and be hanged somewhere else."

"A narrow escape," muttered Gaston to himself as he left the camp. "I wonder what Bouchard would say if he knew it."

A week later our hero reached his destination, and delivered his credentials to the general in command, by whom the grade of lieutenant was immediately conferred on him. At the conclusion of the campaign he was promoted to a captaincy, and in 1871, after the final rout of the Commune, married his cousin Louise. In the following year, while on leave in Paris, he came across his old enemy, Bouchard, on the Boulevard des Italiens.

"How goes it with you?" asked the latter, as they were sipping their absinthe together.

"Admirably," replied Gaston. "Here am I, a captain at twenty-two, Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, and the husband of a charming wife; and all this—no thanks to you, by the way, Bouchard—because I saved my hair."

Digitized by Google

MRS. WOODCOTE'S COUP.

A TELEGRAPHIC TALE.

"REALLY, Evelyn, it is too bad of Mrs. Goodfellow not being here after her promise," said Mrs. Hauton to her daughter, as they stood on the platform of the station at Victoria.

"Never mind, mamma," replied Miss Hauton, "it is but a couple of hours to Brighton, and I can take good care of myself until then."

"Well, dear, your travelling alone is contrary, I am sure, to all etiquette——"

This remark of Mrs. Hauton's was destined not to be finished. The foregoing conversation was heard with interest by a young woman of some thirty-five years, whose most noticeable feature was an alert pair of light grey eyes. With a frank smile the unknown approached the Hautons, and, speaking in well-bred, apologetic tones, said:

"Pray pardon this intrusion, but inadvertently I have overheard your conversation. If this young lady is nervous about travelling alone, it would give me great pleasure to look after her to Brighton, where I also am going."

This extraordinary offer, which would have been curtly, or at any rate, promptly declined by a woman of the world, did not strike Mrs. Hauton as being strange—on the contrary, she accepted it with alacrity and profuse thanks, and ended by introducing herself and daughter to the unknown, who in turn stated that she was a widow, Mrs. Woodcote.

Mrs. and Miss Hauton were simple, and, I fear we must acknowledge, somewhat vulgar people. They were not versed in the ways of polite society, and did not know much of the world. They had not always answered to their present high-sounding surname, being the earthly remainder of John Houghton, a big contractor of Manchester.

The late John Houghton was in many ways eccentric. He had started in life without anything but a clear head and indomitable pluck. In the early part of his career he formulated a theory on which he acted until his death. His theory was that there are but two forms of property that are imperceptibly changed by market changes and fluctuations—gold and diamonds.

The latter being less bulky, it had been his yearly custom to invest a part of his savings in the glittering gems, and on his death his wife and daughter found themselves in the possession of jewels worth somewhere near £50,000, and land and cash to the amount of about £100,000.

This was a great surprise, and almost turned the heads of the two women, who had hitherto lived an extremely comfortable, but somewhat plain life, having no idea of the amount of Mr. Houghton's possessions.

They remained in Manchester for a decent period of mourning, but, sad to relate, the poignancy of grief was forgotten in the luxury of expectation.

Many were the castles in the air they built, and the plans formulated. The first one to be carried out was a change of name, so that it was Mrs. and Miss Hauton that first moved to London and then went for a long trip on the Continent, accompanied by two maids and a man servant.

We shall not follow them about Europe, as their sojourn there was unsatisfactory. They made the acquaintance of lots of men, but these latter, when of the right sort, were somewhat diffident about introducing them to their women folk.

After awhile they tired of the joys of the Continent, and determined to spend a short time in London.

Returning to the station at Victoria, we find Mrs. Woodcote and Miss Hauton just stepping into the train. The guard whistles, and the train glides out of the station.

On the journey they become somewhat confidential. With a mournful air and a far-away look in her grey eyes, Mrs. Woodcote states that she is alone in the world except for one old uncle, and that she is travelling to kill time, and if possible soften her grief at the loss of her husband.

Miss Hauton was either touched by these sad confidences, or had a preference for cheery conversational topics; anyhow, she started off at a brisk rate into a cheery disquisition on the season in London, telling of her conquests, and stating that she was now paying a flying visit to Brighton for her health.

Becoming more confidential, Miss Hauton told her new acquaintance about her father's money and his strange proclivity for diamonds; she also described some of the principal articles of value, and regretted that the setting was rather old-fashioned and out of date.

Mrs. Woodcote agreed that this was a pity, and having heard that this fortune in gems was at all times left in the sole charge of a French maid named Antoinette, and an old butler named Johnson, she made a practical suggestion.

"Surely, Miss Hauton," she said, "it would be wiser to have these jewels sent to a first-class jeweller, and thus remove so great temptation from two servants. You could do so without hurting their feelings by having them reset, and at the same time having French paste duplicates made, keeping the genuine stones in some safe deposit vault, and retaining the imitations in your house for ordinary use."

Miss Hauton laughed at the idea of losing her jewellery, but Mrs. Woodcote's interest in her affairs appeared to be very kind and considerate. Thinking of the widow's lonely life, a good-natured thought came into Miss Hauton's giddy little head, the result of which was, that shortly before the train was due at Brighton she turned to Mrs. Woodcote and said: "I have not yet telegraphed to any friends to meet me at the station, as I told mamma I should. Suppose you and I go to a hotel together? You shall chaperone me and be my guest. We can share a suite of rooms and have delightful talks. Do you agree?"

A strange glitter seemed to scintillate from Mrs. Woodcote's eyes as she replied: "Your suggestion and invitation are far too kind and thoughtful for a lonely woman to lightly reject. Thank you very much. I accept with great pleasure."

Arrived in Brighton the two ladies and their luggage were speedily conveyed to the Hôtel Métropole.

Having engaged a suite of rooms, they went upstairs and had their luggage unpacked. By the time they had their belongings disposed of to their joint satisfaction, the hour was late, and they agreed that it was bedtime, so they started to make their toilets for the night.

When Miss Hauton awoke in the morning she found that it was nine o'clock and that Mrs. Woodcote was already dressed. The latter laughed off Evelyn's apologies for her slothfulness, saying that she was always a very early riser, and made it an invariable rule to be out of doors by 7.30 a.m., however late she retired.

The acquaintance thus peculiarly formed ripened rapidly and progressed by leaps and bounds to friendship, resulting, after two or three days, in all sorts of plans that had the common basis of going somewhere or doing something together. Having dispatched to Mrs. Hauton a letter full of enthusiastic praises of her new friend, Evelyn followed it up by announcing that she had invited Mrs Woodcote to come back to London and stay with her for the remainder of the season.

Mrs. Woodcote in London was not by any means a rival of Evelyn's; on the contrary, she appeared rather averse to man's society; and now, to Mrs. Hauton's surprise, Evelyn began to show a distaste for masculine society, too, and an absentmindedness that was quite new.

The middle of September came and the season waned.

Digitized by Google

Visitors spread their wings for flight, and with them the Hautons, who went to their house in Brighton, a recent purchase that they had not yet occupied.

Mrs. Hauton was not destined to remain there long, as a telegram came from Manchester, which required her immediate presence in the North on business matters. Mrs. Woodcote could chaperone Evelyn, so, having no anxiety on that score, Mrs. Hauton took time by the forelock, and with but little luggage made an immediate start for Manchester, having her maid Antoinette to accompany her.

Mrs. Woodcote and Evelyn had plenty to occupy them whilst settling down in the new house, as all the servants, with the exception of Johnson, the butler, and Evelyn's own maid, were new and needed instructions. Mrs. Woodcote used frequently to talk of the magnificent Hauton diamonds, and finally succeeded in making Evelyn nervous about them, so that she now kept them in her bed-room. Still acting on Mrs. Woodcote's advice, Evelyn kept them all in a large dressing-bag with a strong lock, so that none of the new servants might suspect the treasure that was stored in the house.

Of course, the Hautons often found it necessary to pay short visits to London, and so it was that one day early in October Evelyn and Mrs Woodcote started off for the Metropolis. Just before they left Johnson had asked for leave of absence as his mother was dangerously ill, and had gone to Bristol, whence at the end of four days he sent a respectful notice of the death of his parent, saying that he would return about three days after the funeral. The house had been left in charge of the footman, James, a nephew of Johnson's, for whom the latter was ready to vouch in every respect.

James felt proud of his responsibility, and when a telegram came to him he opened it in the servants' hall with much pomposity, and read aloud as follows:

"A gentleman—Mr. Arthur Sartoris—will call for my dressing-bag. Give it to him, and re-direct all letters to Hotel Victoria, London, for three days.—EVELYN HAUTON."

About two hours after the arrival of the telegram, a highly respectable valet presented a card inscribed "Mr. Arthur Sartoris, Bachelors' Club," and asked for the dressing-bag, which was handed to him without demur.

Having in the meantime finished their shopping and other duties in London, Evelyn and her companion made up their minds to once more turn their faces towards Brighton, and agreed on an afternoon train of Thursday.

The journey was destined to be made alone by Miss Hauton, for Mrs. Woodcote was summoned by telegraph to Liverpool, owing to the serious illness of the only near relation she possessed.

"I must go, dear Evy," she said, "but you may rely on my being with you by Saturday evening at the very latest. Take care of yourself, and be a good little girl."

Miss Hauton went direct to Brighton, and chafed a good deal at her lonely condition. Saturday came, and with it the pleasurable anticipation of a speedy reunion with Mrs. Woodcote, whose absence she had objected too very much.

Four o'clock in the afternoon found Evelyn looking at the clock, and I am in a position to state that she was just then saying to herself, "Only one more hour to wait, and then——"

"A telegram for you, miss," said the obsequious James, handing the yellow-covered missive to her on a silver salver—

"Uncle Henry very ill; with you Tuesday; cheer up. Always your "WOODCOTE."

I will not again assume the privilege of my position to tell you what the gentle Evelyn said on receiving this disappointment.

Sunday was a dull day, and on Monday she welcomed the return even of the staid old Johnson. Calling him to her, she said:

"Johnson, get out my dressing bag, please. I think I shall have some of my diamonds reset, and get you to clean the others."

"Very well, miss," replied Johnson, going to Evelyn's room for the bag.

In a few minutes he returned with his face as pale as death, and said the bag was not there! James was called, and questioned.

It would take an able pen to describe the utter astonishment expressed in Evelyn's face when James produced the telegram received by him, and sent off from London with her name appended to it.

Johnson was a man of acts, not words, and he immediately dispatched a messenger to police headquarters, requesting that two or three detectives be sent up on a very important matter without delay.

As soon as possible an inspector arrived, and listened attentively to the whole narrative, as told by Miss Hauton, Johnson, and James. Being told that the jewels were worth some £50,000 his attention became even more engrossed and fixed.

When they had finished, Mr. Morris, the detective, said:

"Were you alone in London, Miss Hauton?"

"No. I went with my friend, Mrs. Woodcote, whom I expect here to-morrow. We stayed at the Victoria."

"Did Mrs. Woodcote return to Brighton with you?"

"No. She was summoned to a sick relative in Liverpool."

"What relation is Mrs. Woodcote to you?"

"None. She is a friend—the most intimate one I have."

"Is she an old friend?"

"No. I made her acquaintance only this summer. But what do you mean by these extraordinary questions about Mrs. Woodcote? I simply wish you to find my jewellery. I did not send for you to discuss my personal friends with you," rejoined Miss Hauton in a somewhat angry tone, with a flush of annoyance on her face.

"No need to be offended, miss," replied Mr. Norris. "Simply professional custom. We always like to make ourselves familiar with all the surroundings of a case before going to work. What is Mrs. Woodcote's address in Liverpool?"

Having obtained Mrs. Woodcote's address, the first move of the astute Mr. Morris was to telegraph to a brother detective at Liverpool and get him to pay the widow a call. He then called at the Bachelors' Club, where Mr. Sartoris was unknown.

It was not long before he received a cipher reply from Liverpool, which on interpretation was to the effect that the house in question was unoccupied, and that the postman had instructions to keep all letters addressed there at the post-office to be called for.

Mr. Morris addressed a dummy letter to Mrs. Woodcote, and ordered an incessant watch to be maintained at the post-office. In his own mind he had no doubt as to who the guilty party was, and had every intention of making the important capture.

The greatest drawback he had to contend with was not being able to obtain a photograph of Mrs. Woodcote, as this lady, with commendable modesty, refused to have her speaking features reproduced by the photographer's art.

Miss Hauton speedily became reduced to a state of total collapse, attendant on the worry and the notoriety the robbery brought upon her.

The climax came unexpectedly.

One morning Mr. Morris dashed up to the hotel in a hansom. Pulling Johnson in after him they disappeared as fast as the horse could gallop.

Arrived at their destination, which was a police station, they went to an inner room. Here were several high officials of the police department.

Mr. Morris said: "Mr. Johnson, several prisoners are to be paraded here, and we want you to see if you know any of the faces."

The march past commenced, and Johnson scanned each man narrowly. One erect, well-dressed young fellow resolutely turned his face to the wall. He was halted.

Directly Johnson caught sight of his face he jumped about a foot from his chair, and shouted out: "Mrs. Woodcote, by George!"

"Better known as William Howard, the smartest criminal in the kingdom," added the imperturbable Mr. Morris.

Digitized by Google

TWO LITTLE SLIPPERS

I WAS travelling in Ireland with some friends. We were in the south-eastern part of the island and were traversing Connemara, the poorest part of that poor country. If anything can give a horrible impression of misery, it certainly is Connemara.

A profound melancholy seems to rest upon that corner of the earth. Low plains destitute of verdure extend at the right to a chain of mountains, which are bare, as though they had been ravaged by fire. These immense spaces are without a village, often without even a single dwelling.

The few which we pass at long intervals consist only of four stone walls, piled up without cement, and with a black roof. From the back of these dreary cabins issues a thin thread of blue smoke.

In front of them one sees children, from five to twelve years old, with naked feet, sun-scorched skins, and ragged clothing, They utter uncouth sounds in a language which is partly Irish partly English. They usually run after the carriage for several miles. With a supplicating hand, they extend to you some sort of rude merchandise—it may be roughly hewn shoes, it may be woollen stockings, it may be a little bunch of flowers, plucked from the mountain side. They run, shouting, hurrying, hustling each other.

"Penny, please! Penny, please!" they repeat over and over. A penny is finally cast to them.

Immediately there is a brawling, struggling, and fist-pounding. The conqueror deserts the ranks of our followers, but the others still pursue the carriage. One by one the small flock drop away. First the youngest become exhausted and stop. At last there are only three—then two—then only one, who, in his turn, rolls in the dust raised by the wheels, uttering a last "Penny, please!" with laboured and panting breath.

About eleven o'clock we arrived at Ougtherard, near Lake Correb. This lake is said to contain as many islands and also as many inhabitants as there are days in the year. Here we should breakfast.

For a long time a little girl of about twelve followed our carriage. She alone had persisted of five or six children, the rest of whom had dropped away as we passed along. Tall and slender for her age, she had a charming face of the true Irish type of beauty.

Her complexion was darkly browned, and she had large blue eyes. Her long run had put roses into her cheeks; her parted lips showed her brilliant teeth. A ragged brown linen bodice and skirt composed her costume. Her naked feet, which were remarkably small and pretty, seemed to fly through the dust. Poor little one! Our hearts ached to look at her.

Suddenly she uttered a cry, extended her arms, and fell forward. We stopped the carriage, but fortunately nothing serious had befallen her. A projecting stone had slightly cut her foot, which bled a little. We asked her who she was and from whence she came. She called herself "Betsy" and said that she lived at Ougtherard.

We told her to climb into the carriage and we would carry her to her home. She looked at us in bewilderment, as though she could not understand what we were saying. We repeated our offer. She blushed with pleasure, and gave us a look, which, although full of inquiry and wonder, was yet most grateful. She seemed to be overjoyed at riding in a carriage. It was her first experience of that kind.

Ten minutes later we were in Ougtherard, a poor village of forty houses. We gave two shillings to the child as a parting present. She looked at it as though she could not believe her eyes. It occurred to me that the wound in her foot might be inflamed by a walk in the dust. I therefore entered a shoemaker's shop, the only one the place afforded, and bought a pair of slippers for the poor child.

Betsy watched the operation in profound perplexity. When I extended the slippers towards her, saying they were for her, she was dumfounded. She dared not take them.

Finally, as I firmly insisted that the slippers were for her, and only her, she seized them and fled with a bound of joy, and without even saying "Thank you."

"Little savage!" thought I, "she does not even know how to thank anybody."

I rejoined my companions, who were already seated round the hotel dining-table, and we had soon finished our breakfast, and were about to climb into our carriage, when I felt a little hand within mine which sought to detain me.

"Come, sir," she said, "come."

"And where do you wish to lead me?"

"To our house. It is very near."

I followed her. My companions were not a little puzzled. She led me to the bottom of a narrow street. There we paused before a humble cottage. She pushed the door open and we entered. The interior consisted of a single room. It was without a floor and contained scarcely any furniture. It was dimly lighted by the feeble rays which entered through a paper-covered window, near which sat an old woman spinning. She was Betsy's grandmother.

At our entrance three little black pigs scampered under her bench grunting. In the corner stood the lowly bed of the grandmother; at its side the little cot of the child. Just above her pillow Betsy showed me a kind of rough staging leaning against the wall. Upon the middle board, covered with a very white linen cloth, beneath an image of St. Patrick, and between two bunches of white flowers, I perceived—the little slippers!

The poor child looked at her shrine of beauty with admiration, and even with religious awe, as upon a precious relic.

"But you should put the slippers on your feet, they are for you to wear," said I. I could not help laughing to see them set up as sacred objects of devotion.

She appeared astonished, almost angry. "Oh, never," she said earnestly: "they are too beautiful."

We slipped some money into the pocket of the old grandmother, and bade adieu to Betsy.

A month later we passed through the same place, on our return trip, and made a halt there as before. We did not see Betsy. I wished to see her again, if only for a minute.

I sought out and knocked at the door of the poor little cabin. No one opened it.

I lifted the rude latch and entered.

A sad spectacle presented itself to my eyes. Around the little bed of Betsy, lighted by three smoking candles, some old women were kneeling and reciting prayers in a monotonous voice. Upon my entrance the chant stopped, and one of the old women rose and came to me. It was the grandmother.

"Betsy?" murmured I. "Where is Betsy?"

In a few broken words, she explained to me that Betsy had taken a fever and had just died.

I approached the cot. The pale face of the child wore a peaceful expression. Her long black hair lay over her shoulders in heavy curls, but her beautiful bright eyes were shut. Clasped in her thin, blue-veined hands, and pressed closely to her heart, were the image of St. Patrick and the two little slippers. During all the time she had been ill, the old dame told me, she had held them in her hands. I begged the old woman to bury them with her.

A tear came to my eyes. I leant over the poor Irish child and imprinted a kiss upon her forehead.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SUMMER HEAT AND OBESITY.

Summer with its sultry heat, is not a source of unmixed pleasure to those who suffer from excessive corpulence. Health cannot be maintained under conditions of great obesity. In general the mental energy of the highly corpulent becomes impaired, and their capacity for the conduct of business is consequently much diminished. Our readers will therefore be interested to know it is an indisputable fact that excessive corpulency can, in all cases, be cured by the system which has now for many years been successfully practised by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Mr. Russell possesses hundreds of testimonials from persons in all classes of society, many of them holding distinguished positions in the learned professions and in Her Majesty's services, which, taken collectively, prove to a demonstration that anyone suffering from obesity who systematically applies his remedy for a few weeks consecutively can be cured. The patients under his treatment are not asked to be "fasting men"; and it is remarkable that in the case of many of Mr. Russell's subjects their appetite increases as their weight diminishes. A book (256 pages) entitled, "Corpulency and the Cure," containing most interesting and trustworthy information, together with the recipe, may be had by writing to Mr. Russell, enclosing 4d. stamps for postage. With such a remedial agent at their command as Mr. Russell's specific, excessively corpulent persons have only themselves to blame if their unwieldy persons are not speedily reduced to fitting proportions.—Extract from a Leading Journal.

TO METAMORPHOSE FAT PERSONS

"We were reading in the Penny Illustrated Paper how to reduce obesity, wherein it says in that very excellent publication: 'The corpulent will be glad to learn how to lose two stone in about a month with benefit to health, strength, and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular fact that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state with increased activity of brain, digestive, and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto; yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one to two pounds daily, as the weighing machine will prove. The Book, "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), containing the "recipe," can be had gratis from Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., by sending cost of postage, fourpence.' He has discovered a simple herbal remedy, most pleasant to the taste, which entirely disposes of the necessity of starving oneself in endeavouring to be rid of all superfluous matter. An interesting point, which goes to prove that the almost magical compound is beyond doubt harmless, is that in prescribing it in a tentative way to lean persons, or rather to those who carry no superfluity of fat beyond that which is required as fuel for Nature's furnace, the medicine is absolutely inoperative, attacking only that unhealthy, disease-creating waste accumulation which is the burden of the fat creature's existence. In many cases where people take decoctions reputed to be new medical discoveries to cure some specific disease, they may recover by the action of the medicine, or Nature may have effected her own cure. In the case of corpulency, if a simple remedy undertakes to reduce a person, say, 7 lb. in a week, all that one has to do is to get weighed, and thus prove it conclusively. So it is with Mr. Russell's compound, but he asks you to prove it in twenty-four hours only."—Coventry Standard, January 18, 1895.

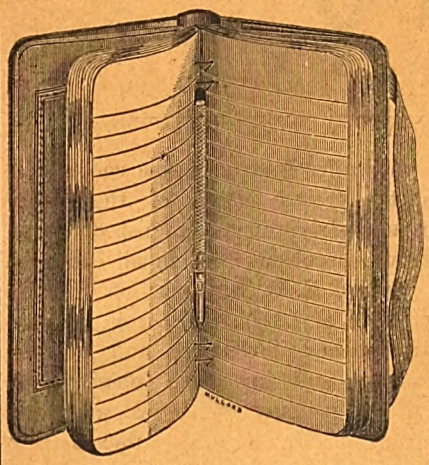
Digitized by Google

COLLINS'
"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK,
WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST AND THE BEST.
THE SIMPLEST AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register" the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,
Bridewell Place, London, E.C.; 139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

MARVELLOUS INCREASE IN CIRCULATION!!

SHORT STORIES.
A 20pp. 4to. Weekly Magazine.

It is now little over twelve months since this magazine came into the hands of Mr. C. Arthur Pearson. It has during that period more than DOUBLED ITS CIRCULATION. This has been caused chiefly by the vast improvement in its literary standard, and the increased facilities for publication. Further efforts in this direction are being made, and a consequent further advance in circulation is confidently anticipated. A serial story entitled "The Tenth of June," from the powerful pen of Mr. John K. Leys, is now running. The story is being illustrated by Mr. Raymond Potter, whose contributions consist of a number of large sketches each week. No advance in the rates for advertisements has been made, nor is any contemplated until the circulation has reached

100,000 COPIES WEEKLY.

The scale is 10s. per inch, or £10 per page; and, as the advertisements are limited to four pages, the most effective publicity is ensured.

ADVERTISEMENT OFFICE:
17, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

RUBBER STAMPS
FREE BY POST.
AGENTS WANTED
Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd.,
92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

RUPTURE CURED
WITHOUT OPERATION, S.J. Sherman, Hernia Specialist, 64, Chancery Lane, London; 26, King Street, Manchester; now sends his new Book of full information, post free, 7d.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

OVER 2,000 New and Secondhand. EASY TERMS —From 10s. per month. Lists (200 page) and Testimonials post free. BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING Co., Liverpool; 45, Everton Road, and 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W. (close to Euston Road).

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,
HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 337. FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 15, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

A WONDERFUL MEDICINE.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS

Are universally admitted to be worth a Guinea a Box for Bilious and Nervous Disorders, such as Wind and Pain in the Stomach, Sick Headache, Giddiness, Fulness and Swelling after Meals, Dizziness and Drowsiness, Cold Chills, Flushings of Heat, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, Costiveness, Scurvy, Blotches on the Skin, Disturbed Sleep, Frightful Dreams, and all Nervous and Trembling Sensations, &c. The first dose will give relief in twenty minutes. This is no fiction, for they have done it in countless cases. Every sufferer is earnestly invited to try one box of these Pills, and they will be acknowledged to be

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

For females of all ages these Pills are invaluable, as a few doses of them carry off all humours, open all obstructions, and bring about all that is required. No female should be without them. There is no medicine to be found to equal BEECHAM'S PILLS for removing any obstruction or irregularity of the system. If taken according to the directions given with each box, they will soon restore females of all ages to sound and robust health. This has been proved by thousands who have tried them and found the benefits which are ensured by their use.

For a weak stomach, impaired digestion, and all disorders of the liver, they act like "Magic," and a few doses will be found to work wonders upon the most important organs of the human machine. They strengthen the whole muscular system, restore the long-lost complexion, bring back the keen edge of appetite, and arouse into action with the Rosebud of Health the whole physical energy of the human frame. These are FACTS testified continually by members of all classes of society; and one of the best guarantees to the Nervous and Debilitated is

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Have the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World.

Being SIX MILLION BOXES per ANNUM.

Prepared only by THOMAS BEECHAM, ST. HELEN'S, LANCASHIRE,

And sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere, in Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with Full Directions.

The 1s. 1½d. Box contains Fifty-six Pills.

BEECHAM'S TOOTH PASTE RECOMMENDS ITSELF; it is efficacious, economical, cleanses the teeth, perfumes the breath, removes tartar, and prevents decay. It is composed of the best known ingredients for neutralising the acids of the mouth, preventing all deleterious deposits upon the teeth, and is a pleasant and reliable dentifrice. BEECHAM'S TOOTH PASTE is put up in collapsible tubes, perfectly air-tight, and so adjustable that no waste need occur; the packages are pretty for the toilet table, and most convenient for the travelling bag. Of all Druggists, or from the Proprietor, ONE SHILLING, postage paid.

Digitized by Google

"All Sorts and Conditions of Men"

USE

ST. JACOBS OIL

FOR RHEUMATISM, Gout, Sciatica, Neuralgia, Cramp, Pleurisy, Lumbago, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Soreness, Stiffness, Bruises, Toothache, Headache, Backache, Feetache, Pains in the Back, Pains in the Shoulders, Pains in the Limbs, and all bodily aches and pains,

IT ACTS LIKE MAGIC.

SAFE, SURE, and NEVER FAILING. Price 1/1½ & 2/6.

CONQUERS PAIN

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 337.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 15, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

THIS is a tale of witchcraft, for all that it took place in this enlightened century.

Herzfeldt, of Trinity, and I were great friends, but I lost sight of him completely after he left Cambridge. A handsome clever Austrian, mad on athletics, and popular in proportion. Three years ago I met him again quite by accident during a long continental ramble I indulged in after being called to the bar.

It was in Vienna. Feeling rather seedy, I had gone to consult a famous doctor, when who should walk into the waiting room after me but Herzfeldt. I never should have recognised him, he was so incredibly changed; thin, worn, feeble—an old man before his time—but he knew me instantly and seemed delighted at the meeting.

He had come into his mother's property somewhere in the Theiss district of Hungary, and he was married: that was the great event, especially as it was comparatively recent. No doubt about its having been a love match. His haggard face flushed like a boy's over it, and it seemed a romantic affair enough from his account—a chance meeting in the Carpathians, while on a sporting expedition, with a child of those wild solitudes; love at first sight—anyhow on his side—a madness of love, which never rested till he had carried her off as his bride. He dwelt a good deal on her extraordinary beauty and attractiveness, but not a word about her family—a silence which I thought ominous in one of his proud race and from which I drew my own conclusions.

"Only the necessity of seeking advice about some strange symptoms, which of late have grown frequent, brings me so far from her to-day," he concluded, smiling; "we are still on our honeymoon, though full three months married."

On my summons to the consulting room, which here interrupted us, I agreed to wait for him till he, too, should be dismissed. This was not, however, until so prolonged a delay that I began to lose patience; but the look on his face as he emerged at length froze remonstrance and even inquiry on my lips. He took my arm mechanically, and walked out of the house like a man in a dream. After we had paced half the length of the street he suddenly halted and looked at me.

"He gives me a year," he said quietly.

I stared at him. "Good gracious! what do you mean?"

"It is the heart, of course," he pursued after a while in a more natural tone. "Let us go down this way; I am bound for the chemist's, for the making up of a certain recipe which the doctor says may save my life—for the moment, be it understood—when the symptoms reappear, and which, in consequence, he says, I am never to be without. I am sorry to have victimised you with this business, Fraser, yet I am selfishly glad to think some friendly soul knows my secret. Of course," half to himself, "I cannot tell her."

"Why not," I exclaimed impulsively; "it is surely her right to know her duty——"

"You cannot conceive what nonsense you are talking," he interrupted, with a curious outburst of irritation; "you Englishmen would judge all women by your own wives and mothers——." He checked himself abruptly, as he caught sight of my amazed countenance, bade me a hurried and careless good-bye, and left me.

Wondering, and not a little chafed, I stood and watched him. Half way across the street he paused, hesitated, and finally came back.

"We are at Csendiak, my country place," he said with some constraint; "do you think you could shortly spare a few days to visit a man with one foot in the grave?"

The invitation was not pressing; but I saw in his eyes that he would like me to accept, though there was something in the background which made him doubtful. At once I jumped at the conclusion that he was jealous of his young wife, and I confess I thought it unworthy of him. Yet under the circumstances, I could not refuse, and was glad of it, for his mysterious manner had piqued my curiosity. He wrote all the necessary directions on his card.

"You will come, then," he said; "that is well. Our first visitor." But there was still the doubt and wistfulness on his face. Then we again shook hands and parted.

Well, to cut a long story short, after a week I landed at Szolnok, the station Herzfeldt had indicated, late in the afternoon. There I found a mail-phaeton, two splendid horses, and a villainous-looking Hungarian in picturesque attire, waiting to convey me across the remaining fifteen miles of that unkempt, desolate, yet rich country. The autumnal air was hot and damp, my conductor taciturn; we had gone some two-thirds of the way under these cheerful circumstances, and I had fallen into a somnolent state, when I was suddenly aroused by the sound of what seemed a mad gallop behind us.

We were traversing a wide plain absolutely denuded of habitation, wreathed with rising mists and strangely dreary under the fading sky. There was still a broad belt of orange light in the west, and as I looked back I saw, blackly defined against it, the image of a woman on horseback. She was

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

She passed out alone.

urging her steed with weird little cries as of some wild bird; in a flash she was upon us, and in another flash was gone.

As she passed she looked back at me over her shoulder and I caught a glimpse of a perfectly white face, heavy yellow hair and extraordinary luminous eyes. Her look struck me—I can use no other word—like a blow.

My driver gazed after her imperturbably, as if Valkyries on the ramparts were an accustomed sight; but my curious questions he could not, or would not, understand. So with the strange image imprinted in my brain, and passing and repassing before me in the gathering gloom, I was forced to reserve my curiosity for Herzfeldt.

It was quite dark when we reached the house. My host was at the gate awaiting me and his welcome was of the warmest.

"I was grieved not to be able to meet you and drive you back myself," he said, as he brought me to my room; "but I could not risk it." The grey pallor of his face, the marked change for the worse in the whole man, even in the short time since we had met, gave melancholy weight to his words.

"Now, do not trouble to dress," he went on rapidly, with determined cheerfulness; "my wife is already expecting us in the dining-room."

He conducted me through the house—typically Hungarian; sumptuous, vast, comfortless and unhomelike—to the dining room, which was as large as a church; there, standing under the full light of the lamps, I beheld the Valkyrie of the road, and I felt a disagreeable shock at the discovery that she was Herzfeldt's wife. Why, I should have been puzzled to explain.

Herzfeldt addressed her in German, the only language in which we could all three meet.

"Hedwig, this is my old friend. Bid him welcome."

She favoured me with a hard stare and stretched out her hand, with the one word: "Wilkommen."

As we sat down and the meal began, I could not help examining her with a curiosity nearly as open as her own. She was not by any means the extraordinary beauty I had expected, yet hers was a strange personality, and one which I could not meet with indifference, which from the first affected me to the most inexplicable extremes. Strongly built, but perfectly proportioned, a skin of opaque changeless pallor on which the scarlet lips made almost too vivid a spot of colour; light grey-green eyes, which each time gave me a fresh surprise when I fell under their scintillating glance, and coils and coils of dead yellow hair wound round a curiously flattened head.

Perhaps the most striking characteristic was an air of intense but repressed vitality, of being ready to spring, behind movements of languorous softness, that reminded me indifferently or rather collectively of a cat and a snake. She spoke in a low drawl, broken now and then with loud inharmonious resonances.

That night, however, for the most part, she was silent. Herzfeldt, on the contrary talked a great deal with a forced jovialty unlike the real man and in painful contrast with his state. At dessert the conversation turned on riding.

"It is almost our whole life here," said Herzfeldt; "but just now my rheumatism obliges me to abstain or we should have had some lengthy expeditions together." He gave me a sad look of warning as he spoke. "We shall enjoy our gallops together, shall we not, Hedwig? It was horrible to have to let you go alone to-day!"

Her answer was a curious one. She first leant her elbows on the table, and looked at him with a broad, incomprehensible smile: then taking a cake in both hands tore a bit off with her teeth, and flung the remainder to the great slate coloured hound which sat beside her.

Revolted, I glanced at Herzfeldt—the soul of refinement. His eyes were bent on his plate and his face was set as if in some mental or physical struggle. Noisily pushing her chair away, my hostess rose. She looked at me when I opened the door, as if expecting me to accompany her, but Herzfeldt showed no sign of moving, and I took it for granted that we were to adopt the English custom. With an angry movement, she passed out alone, swaying her body from side to side in a way which again made me think of some unknown animal combination.

I am not going to describe my whole stay at Csendiak, but will merely touch on such scenes as form, so to speak, the stages of that episode The next, then, was on the third day of my visit. We were all three on the terrace whiling away a hot hour with pistol-shooting. Herzfeldt's wife, a cigar between her lips, lying back in a wicker chair, her shapely feet in her untanned boots, resting on a high cushion, was basking after the mid-day meal in her cat-like way, and watching us with lazy intentness.

I made a brilliant score—I happen to be rather a good hand at a carton; pistol shooting is a lost art among us, but I have had opportunity to cultivate it in Paris; but Herzfeldt shot wretchedly, and that after long aims. Once or twice he had to lower his hand, which trembled visibly. After a few attempts with a look of discouragement, he gave it up. It was pitiful to see that he felt humiliated before his wife.

"A complete break-up, my boy," he said in English, with a sad smile. On her face there was a light of amusement. Not wishing to prolong the scene, I was replacing the weapons in their box when she got up.

"Once more!" she said. "I like to see you aim so quickly and shoot so straight."

Obediently I lifted my hand and this time carelessly missed.

"All luck, you see," I urged, anxious to cover Herzfeldt's vexation; "won't you let me rest on my laurels? As for Herzfeldt, he is out of condition; when he is himself he can beat me."

But Herzfeldt here interposed, irritably bidding me talk no nonsense, and go on shooting without further mock modesty.

"Yes, one more for me," repeated my hostess musingly; "what shall it be?" Then, with her broad smile, "I know," she said, unfastening the gold brooch at her throat and in her swinging,

Fixed the pin in the bark.

Digitized by Google

She had glided from me.

swaggering way stepped up to an old tree and fixed the pin in the bark.

Herzfeldt frowned. "My last present," he muttered. "Never mind, Fraser, bring it down—shiver it!"

I felt her eyes on me as I raised the pistol towards the tiny, glinting spot. To my own astonishment—for I had fired almost unconsciously—the ball grazed the trinket and sent it spinning upward.

Without a word Herzfeldt went to look for it, and laughing, I turned round to his wife, to meet her eyes still fixed upon me with a gaze that suddenly appalled me.

Her scarlet lips, her glass-green glance were full of an odious, satisfied significance which I could not—dared not—put into shape, even in my most secret mind, for the horror of seeming privy to it.

"Thank you," she said to me after a moment; then she took her brooch from her husband's hand and walked away. Half angrily, half sadly, he looked after her, while I in vain endeavoured to shake off the strange unreasoning dread left upon me by the sorcery of her eyes.

I was beginning dimly to understand the nature of Herzfeldt's infatuation for her, since I myself, cool headed though I be, was unable to escape her strange influence. For the rest of the day and the whole night afterwards, sleeping or waking, I was haunted by her image, though when away from the inexplicable attraction of her actual presence the spell immediately changed its character and my unwilling mind dwelt on her with no other feelings but those of horror and disgust.

Under these circumstances, finding all my reason and philosophy of no avail, I rose the next morning, with the intention of curtailing my visit as much as I could without hurting Herzfeldt's feelings. But fate itself intervened—the next day was destined to be the last I spent within those gates. A ride had been arranged for the purpose of showing me the pride of the estate, an imprudence which I feared for Herzfeldt, who daily looked more shattered. But a certain irritability he had of late displayed with me kept me from remonstrating.

At the appointed hour, however, two horses duly made their appearance, and the groom handed me a note. "I dare not go out to-day, you understand, yet would not disappoint her," he ran; "invent some excuse for me, and have your ride."

Even as I finished reading, his wife came out of the house. In a sort of abstraction and totally unheeding my explanations, she walked up to her black Bessarabian and planted a kiss in each fiery nostril. Then accepting my ministration with seeming unconsciousness, her arched foot with its glittering spur scarcely pressing my palm, she sprang into the saddle with some wild Eastern exclamation.

Immediately the animal reared and plunged, while, in fear for her, I held its head as firmly as I might—and now an ecstatic look came on her face, the lazy eyes shot brilliancy, the red lips parted. Suddenly, with a rage of impatience, she cut at me with her whip: "Let him go—let him go!" she panted.

In an instant the brute broke away, shot across the courtyard, rose like a bird to the stone wall and disappeared. Hurriedly I mounted, and in his turn, my horse, quivering with fury at being left behind, darted after his companion. I gave him his head and before long had rejoined her; she had settled down to a canter, awaiting me; as I drew near her she looked round with a silent smile, but no sooner were we abreast than, with another weird cry, she spurred on again, and away we fled at a tearing gallop.

How long the enchantment lasted I can hardly say; gradually our wild steeds slackened pace; panting, covered with foam, they at length fell into a walk.

"This is life!" said one of us—whether she or I, I never knew. I looked at her. She was breathless; the heaviness of exhaustion lay round her eyes; then I, too, felt unaccountably broken with fatigue, a chill crept over me, and in that second, as if a chasm had opened before me, I saw my danger.

"We must go back," I cried in a toneless voice; trembling like a craven, conscious of but one clear thought—the imperative necessity of my instant departure. I turned my horse's head homeward. She followed me; she spoke to me; I cannot remember what I answered, or if I answered at all. The spell was broken, the glamour had faded. In silence we reached the house. I dared not glance at her. I was afraid to help her to dismount; I sprang from my horse and rushed indoors. As luck would have it, in the hall I found a letter awaiting me, which I seized upon as a pretext, and straightway sought my host.

"I have had news which necessitates my leaving you," I said. "Can you send me to the station to-day?"

He looked at me with a sudden awful suspicion, but when our eyes met, his face cleared.

"There is a train at ten o'clock," he answered simply; "I shall order Gregor to be round after dinner." Then moved by the same impulse we clasped hands.

The early hour of the Hungarian dinner came. She was dressed with greater elaborateness than usual; at her throat the little brooch dented by my bullet; her face seemed gleamed more weirdly white, her lips more scarlet, her eyes greener. Beset as I was by conflicting emotions, her presence tortured me. I scarcely looked towards her—I dreaded to meet the strange meaning

I sought to restore the dead to life

Digitized by Google

smile which, by the very side of my dying friend, appeared to claim my complicity in the terrible thought that prompted it.

After my meal I took an early opportunity to escape to my room and don my travelling gear. When I came down again the great hall and the adjoining apartments were deserted. Thinking the husband and wife were together I forbore to seek Herzfeldt, and fell to pacing the length of the ill-lighted dining room from end to end. Presently the valet, carrying my portmanteau, paused at the door, to tell me the carriage would soon be round. With an impatient sigh I resumed my march.

Then, in the gloom and chilling silence, an uncomfortable impression of being watched stole over me, and gradually, as if drawn to it, I met the gaze of two shining eyes fixed on me in the darkest corner. It was the woman again.

She advanced softly into the light.

"You dare to go! Coward, you are running away!" She spat the words at me in a fierce whisper. I felt that I was falling into her power again. My mind—I cannot express it otherwise—was seized with trembling. As to what followed I have myself but a vague knowledge. Her hand fell on mine. Mine must have been icy cold for her touch was burning. Her gaze encompassed my whole being, and before I could grasp at my intelligence and save my good name the lithe gorgeous form was in my arms. As in a dream I could not measure time, but the madness cannot have lasted a second. My arms had barely closed round her when with an angry movement, like a snake disturbed, she had glided from me, and at the sound of a voice the thrall fell away with a rush like that of a torrent from my brain. I came to an awful awakening.

Yet the voice was neither loud nor menacing.

"Could you not have waited?" it said quietly. "It would not have been for long."

Thrilled to the marrow, I looked and saw Herzfeldt—my friend—my host! His face was ashen; his eyes shone with phosphorescent light; he was smiling. It was horrible. Then slowly he went away.

At that moment came the sound of carriage wheels at the door, and my first impulse was to fly at once from the accursed place; but as I turned into the hall the hateful vision of Hedwig arrested me on the threshold; silently, with a significant gesture, she fingered the broken trinket at her throat and vanished.

My mind leapt to her evil meaning, but with a widely different conclusion; the thought of seeking death before Herzfeldt's pistol came almost as a relief.

Like a madman I rushed down the passage and burst into his study. From the threshold the pungent smell of the drug seized me by the throat. He was sitting alone, panting, with his nails dug in his breast. When he saw me he smiled—an awful smile of contempt—through the agony of his seizure.

"You see," he said, in broken words that ended in a hiss, "I have spared you even the trouble of shooting me."

Then, gasping convulsively, with the grey circle of death already round his open mouth, he fell forward on his face.

As with frenzy I sought to restore the dead to life, light footfalls fell upon my ear, and she, who was as truly her husband's murderess as she was the murderess of my honour, came into the room. I sprang to my feet. Once more I looked upon her, saw the flash of satisfaction behind her first glance of mere curiosity, met the infamy of those eyes as they met mine, and my head reeled. But the spell was now one of pure horror. She barred my way and would have spoken. I struck her from me and fled. I heard her cry out in strident contempt, "Fool!" And the cry pursued me as I leapt into the carriage and was whirled away into the night.

A WILY WIDOW.

FRED HAWTHORN was a man about town, in every sense of the word.

The proverbial silver spoon had been born with him, and now, at the age of twenty-five, we find him a confirmed bachelor, with more money, perhaps, than brains.

A very desirable catch, thought the dames of West Kensington with marriageable daughters, and many a siege was made for poor Fred's banking account. But our hero was cold and callous to their winning ways, and, while admitting his devotion to the fair sex, would not enter the net of the snarer; so, day by day, month by month, Hawthorn lived his life, with a modicum of the vices attendant to a man about town. The monotony of routine bored him, however. 'Twere a great pity he had not taken up a profession, if only to cut short the tedious hours of the day. Small wonder that the card tables knew him as a regular attendant; the racecourse recognised him as an energetic plunger.

Lately a series of reverses in matters monetary had not added to his good humour.

He sits and muses as to his next move; to get out of the ruck of his hum-drum life, he will clear off to a little country place for a few weeks' fishing? Yes, a good idea! No sooner thought than done, and Fred is in the depths of Bradshaw.

Eventually he desides on the little fishing village of W——— on the Welsh coast.

Next morning his portmanteaux are packed, and Hawthorn is off to Euston and catches the midday train.

It is late in the night when he arrives at the outlandish spot, and on inquiring finds the small and only hotel in the place is filled with a large fishing party.

Here's a nice dilemma!

The obliging station-master advises him to try Mrs. Keeble's lodging-house, on the Parade—"and very clean and comfortable you'll find it too, sir!" he adds. Hawthorn is too dog-tired to cared what kind of diggings form his rest for the night, and, bundling his boxes into a ramshackle old cab, drives off. Happily there are rooms to let at Mrs. Keeble's, and, although they are primitive, the station-master has not erred in describing them as "clean and comfortable." Hawthorn turns in between the sheets of the small bed and sleeps on until the next morning is far advanced, the sun high in the sky: he breakfasts in a small parlour overlooking the sea, and eats heartily and with a relish quite novel to him.

Later on he strolls out to the shore and goes for a sail, and, while skimming across the water, experiences the peace for which he has longed.

That evening, he dines in the best and largest room attached to the Keeble establishment, and again experiences satisfaction from the fact that no member of the opposite sex is staying in the house, the only other visitors being two old enthusiasts who have come down for the excellent sport to be found in the neighbouring trout stream.

For three whole days Hawthorn lives a life of Arcadian ease and simplicity. He rises early in the mornings and driving over to the abode of Mr. Trout, sits for hours, his pipe between his teeth, indulging in the pastime that Walton loved. Then home to late dinner, finishing up with a cigar and cider at the Railway Inn.

On the fourth day a shock is awaiting him, for, on his return home, he stumbles over two large boxes, clumsily placed in the hall. His eyes catch the name on the labels of the boxes, "Mrs. Marchmont," at the same moment his ear catches the frou frou of a lady's dress in the room beyond. Hawthorn is in a bad humour when he comes down to dinner. To add to his chargrin he finds the new comer already seated at the table with the two old fishermen. He goes through the menu in silence, but curiosity prompts him to take sly glances at the unconscious intruder.

Digitized by Google

She is rather pretty and attractive—that he is bound to admit—with hazel eyes, a mass of golden hair loosely coiled about her head, and a complexion that many a country lass would enjoy.

But Fred has determined to eschew the female sex, at least for the time being. He moodily finishes the meal, and, without regard to that etiquette due to the presence of a lady, walks off to the Railway Inn, where he remains till closing time, indulging in the first fit of bad humour since his arrival at W——.

During the remaining days of the week, Hawthorn sees the lady at intervals, and, although they have broken the conventional ice and spoken, has been barely civil to her.

On the Sunday night he sits reading in his bedroom until the drowsy god catches him up, and he undresses and goes to bed. He has just dozed off, when he hears a voice, close by his bedside, that brings him back to the world, wide awake.

"Dear heart," the voice is saying, "have you no consideration or kindly feeling for me? Are we always to be as strangers? Will you for ever refuse the love I long to shower upon you? One kind look, a word, or a smile would tend to ease my aching heart. My love, my love, why will you not come to me?"

Instinctively, one of Fred's arms comes out from beneath the bedclothes and waves about in the vicinity of the bed, but grasps nothing but air.

Yet he could swear "she" is in the room, for he has recognised her voice. Hastily he lights the candle and searches round, but the room is empty.

Shall it be confessed that he even goes down on his knees and peers under the bedstead! He remains as one dazed. What does it all portend? Is it possible that something not to be realised has drawn him to this woman? He will go to bed and sleep it off.

Scarcely is his head on the pillow than the voice again is heard:

"What mad regret is mine!—A love scorned. Why did you come across my path to make me love you?" and then comes the sound of a woman sobbing.

Hawthorn lies in bed trembling and perspiring, scarcely daring to breath.

Every minute he expects to hear the voice recommence, but all is silence now, and eventually he drops asleep.

The next morning, on going down to breakfast, he learns that the young widow has gone out for a drive across the Cliffs. What is the reason of the regret he feels—the suspicion of a longing to see her?

He ruminates all the day through, and actually feels glad when the dinner hour arrives. "Will she be there?" he wonders. "Will anything have happened to keep her away?"

He is not to be disappointed, for on entering the dining-room he discovered his divinity seated in her usual place, radiant as ever, and looking even more beautiful, as Fred thought.

She smiles upon him as he takes his seat, he in return inclining his head, feeling too agitated to speak.

All through the meal he dare not look at her—feeling her gaze upon him, reading the thoughts of his very heart.

Dinner finished, he springs forward to open the door as she rises to leave the room, receiving for his pains a sweet smile that causes his heart to throb at a high rate.

That night he goes to bed, very wakeful, awaiting the mysterious voice.

At last it comes.

"My love, my curly-haired handsome boy, you have made my heart so glad. You have smiled on me! But, have I found your love—for which I pine? See, my arms are extended, hungry for your fond embrace—my lips ready to be pressed to thine. Take me, oh, take me, for I cannot live without you." A pause here—and the sound of a long drawn sigh; then, "Good night, fond heart, good night," and all is silence.

Fred lies awake thinking until the dawn comes. By that time he has decided on his course of action.

Yes, yes, he loves her; of that he is sure. She is the only woman in the world that can rouse such passions within him. He will see her in the morning and offer all he has in the world in return for her true love. Yes, he will not dare to fight against fate; and with relief in his heart he turns to the wall and falls asleep.

. . . . . .

At breakfast he meets the lady, and openly smiles at her across the table, causing the long lashes of her eyes to drop, while a blush mounts quickly to the pretty face.

Fred can scarcely tolerate the presence of the two old fogeys, who prevent him from having the desired téte-à-téte. She has gone at last, and he waits a decent interval, with the fixed intention of following her and pouring out the flow of passion cramped up in his system. Quite casually he dons his straw hat, and goes out on to the front, looking strong and happy in his new joy.

On the shore two young men are talking and laughing loudly, but at the sight of Hawthorn their merriment ceases, and they go on with their work of fitting up the sailing-boat.

Recognising one as the son of Mrs. Keeble, Fred walks over to them and enters into conversation.

"I say, John," asks Hawthorn, "can you tell me anything about that lady?" pointing in the direction of Mrs. Marchmont, who is sauntering along the beach.

"Oh, yes, sir, she is a widow lady who comes here every year"—and here the young fellow bursts into a violent fit of laughter.

Hawthorn has the greatest difficulty in keeping his temper.

The young boatman is quick to notice this, and expresses his sincere regret, with a hope of pardon. Then, as if by a sudden impulse, he blurts out, "I think I ought to tell you about that woman. Sir, she's a wrong 'un, and that's straight. She gave me a sovereign to fix a pipe from her room to the head of your bed, and I'm sorry now I did it!"

A light comes into Fred's eyes as he stands and stares at the young man. Then he finds his tongue, and what follows seems to give relief to the young man from town, for he strolls about the place for the rest of the day with a merry twinkle in his eye.

. . . . . .

Fred goes to bed that night with the set smile on his face.

This time he allows the candles to burn.

Evidently he is awaiting the voice—no longer mysterious.

At the right time, it comes.

"Dear love, I am unhappy to-night, for you have evidently evaded me. And but yesterday you were so kind, so loving towards me. Tell me, sweetheart, what it all means?"

Fred lifts himself on his elbow, tears aside the curtain at the head of the bed, and putting his lips to the end of a trumpet end, fitted into the wall, shouts at the top of his voice:

"Am I to be pestered every night in this way? Why don't you go to bed and give off that bosh under the clothes?"

A short scream and the gasp from a woman tells him the words have reached home. He pulls the curtain into its place, nestles down in the pillows, and snores loudly.

. . . . . .

The following morning, on going down to breakfast, Hawthorn learns that the widow has flown—a summons from a relative lying dangerously ill being the cause of her abrupt departure by the early train.

NOTICE.

NEXT week will be commenced in SHORT STORIES a splendid serial story by FREDERICK LESLIE, Author of "Lawyer Bell," "An Ideal Love," &c., &c. This story will be entitled and will be profusely illustrated by Mr. A. KEMP TEBBY.

SINDBAD'S VALLEY,

Digitized by Google

By John K. Leys, Author of "In the Toils," "My Hindoo Friend," &c., &c.

Illustrated by Raymond Potter.

CHAPTER XXIV.—continued.

The wind seemed to be still rising, but there was no sound from the sea.

"Come with me a moment," said Linton, going back in the direction of the house.

Geoffrey followed him.

As he went up to the house, Linton purposely made a good deal of noise. Immediately a loud cry burst on their ears. "Here! Help! Murder!" It came from the dining-room.

"I told you so!" cried Linton, darting past his friend into the house. "Those shouts might be heard on the beach. In any case, if anyone comes ashore, he is sure to come up here," he added as he made his way to the sitting-room.

"There, that won't hurt you."

"So that is the way you keep your parole!" he cried out as he opened the door.

Byngham's shouts ceased at once. He turned on Linton a look full of unsubdued ferocity. But Linton whipped the Captain's handkerchief out of his pocket, and, with its half, fastened a small stick of firewood between his teeth.

"There, that won't hurt you, or prevent your breathing," said the young man. "And, as for the unpleasantness of the thing, you have yourself to thank for it."

The two friends then hurried back to the beach. They were anxious to intercept the Captain's visitors, and find out from them, if possible, where Captain Byngham had meant to go that night, and what might have been his errand.

They had not waited long before a voice hailed them out of the darkness. Geoffrey answered; and presently they saw a boat manned by four rowers emerging from the gloom. The shore was well suited for landing, as the beach shelved rather suddenly, and the sea was not high enough to give much trouble, the wind being off shore.

"They will only expect to see one person," said Geoffrey in a whisper to his friend. "You had better go back to our lodgings."

"I will wait outside," said Linton, as he disappeared in the darkness.

Geoffrey guided the boat in, and helped to pull her out of the water.

A burly fellow who looked like an English seaman stepped up to Geoffrey, and said to him:

"Are you the man going on board the Aphrodite?

For a moment the young barrister thought he had committed a horrible blunder. What more natural, than that a boat from the yacht should be sent ashore for Captain Byngham, if he had been asked to make one of the yachting party?

"The Aphrodite?" he stammered.

"Ay," answered the man, with a short laugh, "the new Aphrodite, I may call her."

This was unintelligible to Geoffrey; but he answered, "No."

"Where is he? I thought you were a friend of his?" said the sailor.

"Oh, Captain Byngham you mean? I know him very well. Yes. He's not come down yet."

"So I see. Well, he had better be quick. The wind is getting fresher every minute; and it will be a tough job to get back."

"Oh, he's coming back, then, is he?"

"Of course he's coming back. Him and the young lady.

"It's too rough a night to land a lady in."

"That can't be helped. She's bound to come to-night."

Geoffrey's heart beat fast. He thought he had his finger now on the very pulse of the plot. He resolved to hazard a question.

"Is her father coming ashore too?"

Dark as it was, Geoffrey felt that the sailor was throwing a suspicious glance at him. The man's tone was full of suspicion as he answered roughly:

"No; I know nought about the old man."

There was more than suspicion in his tone. It was the voice of a man who knew more than he dared to confess, even to himself.

Just then the cold wind drove a hail of raindrops in their faces.

"Are you the man going aboard the 'Aphrodite'?"

Digitized by Google

A small knot of men approached.

"I shan't wait out here any longer!" cried Geoffrey in affected impatience.

"You? Are you goin' with 'im then?"

"I was; but I don't know. It's beastly weather."

"I had no instructions about you."

"Oh, please yourself. I'm not anxious to go, on such a night as this especially. But I say, you might as well be under shelter till Captain Byngham comes back. I can take you to his house where the signal is—that's his house; and the moment he comes home you will know it."

"I hardly like leaving the boat."

"Leave the men with her, then; or—the tide's on the ebb—pull her up on shore a bit. She'll be right enough."

Still the man hesitated. Geoffrey was in an agony of suspense; but he kept his voice well under control.

"Well, I'm off," he said, moving over the sand as he spoke. "I don't see the fun of getting soaked here, when I might just as well be under shelter."

Still the seaman did not move, and Geoffrey was afraid to stay longer, lest the man should begin to suspect that his object was to get him away from the boat, and seat him comfortably in the kitchen of the Villa Carnot.

Just as he reached the garden-gate, Geoffrey ran back to the boat. The four men were stolidly sitting on the gunwale, waiting. He slipped a couple of francs into the hand of the man he had already spoken to.

"Captain Byngham is sure to come to the house first," he said; "and I will tell him you are here. But in case you should see him coming along, raise a shout to let me know, will you? I'll run down in a minute; for I want to see him before he goes."

The man promised he would do what was asked of him; and as he pocketed the francs, the last shade of suspicion disappeared from his mind. The rain was falling faster than ever, and the men were audibly grumbling when Geoffrey left them for the second time.

Linton, who had watched all that went on, met his friend at the door of the villa; and they exchanged a few rapid sentences. Then Jack Linton went off, to carry out the instructions which Geoffrey had given him during their hurried talk.

He had barely disappeared in the direction of Madame Fresual's, when the sound of footsteps was heard on the gravel outside. Geoffrey darted to a window. He could make out four lumpish figures in the darkness outside, hanging about the gate, as if uncertain whether they should advance or retreat.

Geoffrey hurried out to them.

"Better come round to the kitchen door," he said to them. "You can sit down there, and I'll serve you out a glass of grog."

The men touched their caps, and followed him.

The stove was lit in the kitchen; and though it could not dry the men's soaking clothes, the glow looked cheery and comfortable. In a few seconds the sailors—a rascally-looking set, as Geoffrey remarked to himself—were seated round it, each one with a glass of spirits in his hand. The brandy was Captain Byngham's. Geoffrey placed the bottle in charge of the leader of the party; and then saying that he was going to look for Captain Byngham in the town, he went off.

Instead of going to the town, however, he went straight to the boat and seated himself on the gunwale. The rain had made quite a small pool in the bottom of the boat. Geoffrey found the baling-can, baled it out, and then sat down again on the edge of the gunwale.

Of all the experiences he ever had, Geoffrey said afterwards, that was the most trying. It was a race against time. At any moment the trick might be discovered; at any moment the sailors might take it into their heads to return to the boat. Everything depended on the degree of good luck that Linton might experience.

The suspense became absolutely unbearable; yet nothing could be done—nothing. Sometimes Geoffrey would take a few hurried steps in the direction of the town, and stand bending his head to listen; but no sound other than the lashing of the rain and the loud moaning of the wind fell on his ears; and he was forced to go back to his place by the side of the boat.

Suddenly he started.

He had heard a low, undefinable noise, that told him someone was approaching.

A small knot of men appeared.

"Linton!" cried Geoffrey in a voice that trembled with anxiety.

"Right my boy. Here are Jacques and Ernest, and another fine fellow, all ready to go anywhere and risk anything in such a cause. And here are the things you wanted."

He handed Geoffrey a heavy ulster, a brandy-flask, and a revolver as he spoke.

"God bless you! I will never forget this!" cried Geoffrey, as he gripped for a moment, the hand of each of his new allies.

The boat, seized by five pairs of hands, was quickly run down to the water's edge. A minute later Geoffrey and his friends were pulling rapidly out to sea.

CHAPTER XXV.

WHAT HAPPENED ON BOARD.

"WE'VE missed her, Jack!"

"Aye; it looks like it."

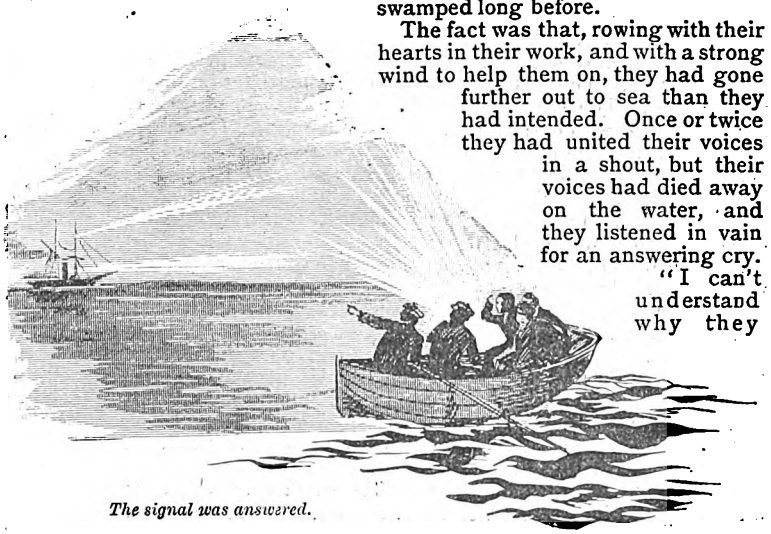
"What had we best do?"

"Turn her head round, and try the eastward."

The two friends had to shout at each other, though there was only the length of the boat between them. The tumbling waves rose higher and higher. Luckily, Fresual was at the helm; if he had not, the boat would probably have been swamped long before.

The fact was that, rowing with their hearts in their work, and with a strong wind to help them on, they had gone further out to sea than they had intended. Once or twice they had united their voices in a shout, but their voices had died away on the water, and they listened in vain for an answering cry.

"I can't understand why they



The signal was answered.

Digitized by Google

"One word, and you are a dead man."

don't show a light," growled Geoffrey. "They must be expecting the boat back by this time."

"We ought to have brought a lantern," said Linton, "but one can't think of everything."

"Isn't there a locker of some sort under the seat, Fresual?" shouted Geoffrey. "Just see if there is anything there one can make a signal with."

The Frenchman opened the tiny receptacle, and found a blue-light.

"Hurray! That's the expected signal, no doubt!" cried Geoffrey. "Just set fire to it, Jacques; you understand these things."

In another minute or two a strong blue light was shedding its unearthly glare over the boat and the men in it, and the black sea that surrounded them. Before it had burned itself out the signal was answered. Away to the east shone out two white lights close together.

"There she is!" cried Geoffrey. "Give way, lads; we'll soon be on board of her!"

There, however, he was wrong. The most toilsome part of the work now began, for the wind no longer drove them along before it. But Frenchmen and Englishmen alike pulled hard, and soon the distance between the boat and the two lights sensibly diminished.

Geoffrey, meantime, had been forming something like a plan of action. The first point, of course, was to get on board the steamer. The next was to find out who was in charge of the yacht, and who had sent for Captain Byngham. Of course, there was a possibility that he was on a false scent. But the sailor had used the name Aphrodite, and what likelihood, Geoffrey asked himself, was there that any young lady would go ashore from the yacht at night under Captain Byngham's care, if all were well on board?

At all events he had now gone too far to retreat, and there was this consolation—if he had made a mistake no irreparable injury had been done, whereas if any plot against Sir Arthur or Leila was on foot he was doing his best to stop it.

One thing seemed plain amid the cloud of uncertainties. It had been clearly understood that no Hindoos except the Rajah were to sail in the Aphrodite. The presence of any Hindoos on board would be an almost infallible sign that foul play was being practised; and it would be war to the knife between him and them.

Nearer and nearer drew the boat. The black-hulled steamer was riding at anchor, her head to the shore. The boat drew up on her port bow, and swung round, Geoffrey, who was in the bows, catching a rope that was thrown out to him.

Thrusting his revolver into the breast pocket of his tweed jacket, Geoffrey clambered on board, Jack Linton following close at his heels.

When he reached the steamer's deck Geoffrey stood amazed. The ship seemed to have been deserted. Not a soul was to be seen. Linton's head was just appearing above the bulwarks, when Geoffrey heard a gentle footfall on the deck behind him. He turned sharp round, and met Chunder Sen face to face.

For one instant the Hindoo was speechless—dumb from terror. He had up to that moment believed that Geoffrey Dundas was lying at the bottom of a mountain tarn. For that second of time the Hindoo could not think. If he thought at all it was to struggle against the belief that a disembodied spirit stood before him. But that second of inaction was enough. Before he could recover his senses, much less raise an alarm, Geoffrey had caught him by the throat, and, by main force, dragged and pushed him down upon the deck. Another second, and the young Englishman's knee was on his chest, while a cold iron circle which the Hindoo well knew to be the mouth of a revolver barrel, was pressed against his temple.

"One word, one cry, and you are a dead man," said Geoffrey in his ear.

The Hindoo lay perfectly still.

"I say, Geoff," whispered Linton, "suppose this steamer belongs to the Hindoos, we should be in a pretty mess, shouldn't we?"

"Mind him, Jack; and shoot him like a dog if he so much as utters a sound," was all Geoffrey's answer.

"I'll risk it," said Jack philosophically; as, taking a revolver he had borrowed from Fresual, out of his pocket, he knelt down on the body of the prostrate Hindoo.

Geoffrey, amazed at the perfect silence on board, made for the cabin companion-way, and went down.

At the bottom of the stairs, suspecting a plot, he stopped short, and cocked his revolver.

"Is anybody there?" he called out.

A shout came from his left hand—and one piercing cry from his right.

Geoffrey recognised the General's voice; but for the moment,

Geoffrey fought like a madman

Digitized by Google

he was deaf to it. He bounded in the direction of the cry he had heard; and gave a furious wrench to the handle of the cabin-door.

"Is that you? Are you there, Miss Chetwynd?" he said in a low whisper.

"Yes—oh yes, dear Mr. Dundas! We are prisoners here, papa and I. But now you are come we are saved! Oh, thank God—thank God, we are saved!"

As she uttered these last words, Geoffrey's arm was thrown round her waist, and she was swept bodily out of the cabin. The key had been left in the door to enable Captain Byngham to carry out the pretended rescue, and Geoffrey had only to turn it and throw open the door.

"Don't faint, please," he whispered to her. "Our work is not over, and we have not one moment to lose. If we alarm the crew we are lost. Where is your father?"

Leila pointed to the opposite door. She could not speak.

That door was locked, and the panels were boarded up. For a moment Geoffrey hardly knew what to do. It was impossible to leave the General behind, yet it was equally impossible to break open the door without spending so much time and making so much noise that discovery would be a certainty.

"Are you there, General?" he said, in as loud a voice as he dared to use.

"Good heavens! Dundas! I thought I heard your voice, but—How are you here? Have you got my daughter? Save her, Geoffrey, as you hope for heaven—save her! Never mind me."

"She is here with me. But the question is, how to get you out without raising an alarm."

"Have you a boat?"

"Yes, I have a boat manned by friends, but——"

"Then take Leila to it at once. I command you to do this. Don't hesitate for a moment."

"No, papa, no!" cried the girl. "I cannot go without you." She sank down on her knees as she spoke.

"Do as you are told, Leila! Geoffrey, take her away at once—Go!"

All this had been said in a few seconds; but seconds were precious. There was no time to wait longer. Geoffrey caught up Leila in his arms, and carried her up the steps. On the deck he saw Linton still kneeling on the body of the Hindoo. Fortunately, these two were concealed from the eyes of the crew by the engine-house. Geoffrey could make out three or four shadowy figures in the fore part of the vessel. If these men suspected for one instant what was going on, it would be all over. But they suspected nothing. It was exactly what they had been told to expect—an Englishman carrying the lady down to the boat.

The sea was running so high, that although the steamer partly sheltered the small boat, it was a very difficult thing to bring her near enough to get Leila on board of her. At last the boat was tossed right up to the bulwarks.

"Now jump, Leila!" cried Geoffrey in her ear.

She obeyed; and was safely caught by two pairs of strong arms, and laid down in the stern-sheets. The instant Geoffrey saw that she was safe, he sprang to Linton's side, and whispered a word in his ear.

Then he rushed down the cabin-stairs. The Hindoos and Lascars, supposing that he had gone to fetch a cloak or bag for the lady, never stirred.

Bang!—Bang!

They stared at each other for a moment, and then rushed aft; but Geoffrey and the General reached the top of the cabin-stairs before them. Geoffrey had blown in the lock of the cabin-door with two shots of his revolver.

The moment the Hindoos saw the two Englishmen they rushed up to them, and Geoffrey fired two more shots at them, wounding two men. Then he rushed forward, knocking down a third Hindoo with a blow from his left shoulder.

"Quick, Linton!" he cried. "Get into the boat, while I keep those fellows at bay!"

The Rajah . . . fell into the sea.

Linton sprang up, darted to the side, and threw himself over, hardly caring whether he alighted on the small boat or not. He was just on the heels of the General, who had made a leap for the boat the moment before. Both reached their mark, badly bruised, but not seriously hurt.

"I will kill the first man who touches me!" cried Geoffrey.

But the threat was useless. They rushed on him as one man. He pulled the trigger, but something had jammed—the revolver missed fire.

Then Geoffrey was desperate, and he fought like a madman. Seizing one man by the throat with his right hand he hurled him back on his fellows, and gained one second's time. In that second he had reached the side of the steamer, and had also turned the revolver in his hand, grasping it by the barrel. It served him for a weapon.

One Hindoo, who had raised a knife high in the air, went down as if he had been shot; another, who had caught him by the leg, received a blow on his hand which made him let go. He was almost free, when a third caught him round the neck. This man he managed to thrust away from him by main force. Then he vaulted over the side, intending to drop into the sea; but just then a wave carried the boat close up to the vessel's side, and he fell upon the heads of his friends.

"Now, lads, give way!" sang out Linton. One of the Frenchmen gave his oar a vigorous thrust against the side of the steamer, while the other two tugged hard at their oars. But it took a minute to get any way on the boat in the rough, tossing sea; and, if the Hindoos had had fire-arms, they might have shot down the rescued and the rescuers at their ease.

Just as they were drawing clear, a dark figure sprang on the bulwarks.

"Shoot him!" cried young Fresual.

"No, don't!" screamed Leila. "It is the Rajah!"

As he stood there, balancing himself for the spring, another dark form appeared behind him. The next moment the Rajah gave a cry, sank down, and fell into the sea.

(To be concluded.)

Digitized by Google

THE KING OF DEATH.

HE had entered the marble passage leading to the boudoir of the Countess when the sound of heavy breathing and the soft patter of slippered feet on the tiles caused him to turn his handsome head.

It was Matuska, an old retainer of the Borisloffs, a wrinkled old woman, as ugly as a Hindoo idol, who carried herself with military precision despite her eighty years. She had nursed the Borisloffs for two generations; she knew of no other world beyond the boundaries of their estates.

To-night her face was flushed, her beadlike eyes gave forth a steely glitter, as she paused panting before the young man, and laid one wrinkled hand like the claw of a bird on his arm:

"Go back, illustrious pani," she stammered, breathlessly, "you must come here no more to see the Countess."

"And why not?" he asked, pulling idly at his black moustache, which drooped over his smiling mouth.

"Because—because," and the words seemed to stick in her throat, "last night when you were here, as I waited at the end of the passage, a shadow passed me. I am sure it was the Count—that he had been listening in the ante-room. You know the furious nature of Borisloff, even though you come to see the Countess as a simple friend. You know his mad adoration for his wife. Moreover, you know that in all Europe no one is so sure of aim as he with a pistol."

"Bah!" said the young man. "You mean well, I dare say, my dear Matuska, but I fancy you had been taking too much vodka when you saw the Count. He is far away in Moscow. Madame the Countess had a letter from him only yesterday. Go to bed. You are full of foolish fancies, old woman," and he shook her off and passed on.

Matuska leant against the wall and watched him disappear.

"There is a shadow on this house," she murmured, pressing her wrinkled hands together. "To-day the cross in the chapel fell from the altar. It is an ominous sign. But what is old Matuska to do to avert the calamity? Holy Father, if Borisloff has really returned!" and she glided down the passage in the direction the young man had taken.

In the meantime Loris had pushed aside the curtains and entered a large hall fitted up like a conservatory. The air was warm and perfumed, almost inebriating in its heavy fragrance. He did not announce himself, knowing well that he was expected. And he sat down in a fantastic chair covered with crimson plush, whose scarlet arms gave him the appearance of being clasped in the jaws of a giant crab.

The subtle fragrance of the apartment was conducive to dreams, but to judge from his face they were pleasant, as he smiled softly to himself and plucked idly at a blood-red rose that nodded its fragrant head towards him as a gust of warm air swept through the curtain.

"Loris!"

A flutter of skirts and the Countess stood before him.

He rose with a startled cry.

"How beautiful you are," he murmured, kissing her softly, almost reverently.

And beautiful she was indeed, as she sat down on a sofa covered with white fur, and motioned him to take a seat beside her.

She played with the filaments of the feather trimming of her gown as softly as a bird smoothing its plumage. As she sat there she looked like a spirit of the snow.

"Well, have you nothing to say to me?" she asked, with a little pout, turning her black eyes full upon him.

He started again.

"I was so intent on admiring you," he murmured, "that for the time I could find nothing to say. It seems cruel to be able to find only common words to speak to a goddess." Then he told her about Matuska and her suspicions.

"Poor Matuska," said the Countess with a laugh; "she is so devoted to our house that at times her fidelity oversteps the bounds. I hope, Loris, that her words have not frightened you," casting a quick glance at her companion.

"Frightened me?" looking up. "Oh, no. At the same time I should not care to meet Borisloff with a pistol in his hand if he mistook the nature of my visits."

"He must be a skilful marksman if he can send a bullet all the way from Moscow," laughed the Countess. "I heard from him again to-day. He will not return without letting me know," and her metallic laughter rang through the room, the glass walls of which gave it a bell-like sound, and roused answering echoes from the halls on either hand.

But what was that? The echoes did not die away; a harsh, growling sound was heard from the marble passage through which the young man had just entered.

The Countess heard it, too, and her face grew pale as her snowy gown. She had risen, and they stood listening, and at the same time regarding each other with dilated eyes.

There was a sound of struggling without, the clamour of angry voices, and one louder than all the rest pierced like a sharp sword the two occupants of the room.

"I will not believe it. You lie, you cat! I will convince you that you are wrong, and then you shall be knouted."

"My husband!" murmured the woman in white.

Then they heard the furious falsetto of Matuska.

"The proof is not wanting—here—here!"

The curtains were torn aside. The Count, his face flushed with evil passion, was pushed, half dragged into the room by Matuska. Behind them crowded the servants of the house, talking to each other in hushed whispers.

"Are you satisfied, Altesse?" cried the old nurse, pointing to the man and woman that stood silent in the centre of the room, stupefied by this sudden onslaught.

The Count was silent a moment. His face had resumed its calm expression; only his eyes displayed his anger.

"Take that woman," pointing to Matuska, "to the court-yard and flog her," said he to a tall mujick.

The old woman was dragged screaming away. With an imperious gesture Borisloff motioned for the others to follow.

"Now, monsieur," he said calmly, turning to Loris, "you need not attempt any explanation, for I assure you it would be useless. You may be innocent of any intent to wrong, but the publicity given this affair necessitates one thing:—that you should meet me in a duel. I have a right to kill you. Society would acquit me if I did, but I shall give you a chance for your life. I will believe you less guilty than you are."

"You are very considerate, I am sure," replied Loris, ironically, for though the sudden appearance of the Count had surprised him, he was far from being a coward.

"You may believe that this melancholy affair has turned my head," said the Count. "But I assure you that I was never saner in my life, when I propose a peculiar duel." He went over to a small table, and picked up a pack of cards. "Now, monsieur, we shall take our seats at the table, we shall play a game of écarté, the stakes—the life of the loser. You know I am an unerring shot, while you are but an indifferent one, so I wish that our chances should be entirely equal. If you lose, you will, as a man of honour, blow out your brains before noon to-morrow. If the game go against me, I shall do the same. Do you accept?"

"I accept," came the reply from the dry lips of the young man.

"Very good. For how many points shall we play?"

"Five."

The game was begun. The only witness was the Countess, who, attracted by a terrible curiosity, had drawn near the players, her eyes fixed on the gaily painted bits of cardboard on which the fate of two lives depended.

Digitized by Google

Fortune seemed to favour the Count. The game stood four to nothing. The face of Loris for the first time during the game grew grey and worn looking. He had bitten his lip, and a fleck of blood dropped down on the cards in his hand.

The Countess, whose hand rested on the table, was shaking like a wind-blown leaf. Her husband looked at her pallid face, and smiled.

"Give me the cards," he cried. "It is my deal."

The cards glided in and out through his white fingers as if animated with life. The silence was broken only by the sound of heavy breathing and the rattle of the woman's ringed hand on the board.

Even that ceased when he dealt; but as the last card slipped from his hand there was a crash.

The Countess had fallen at their feet.

He had turned the king!

A harsh laugh followed. Borisloff stooped and raised his wife from the floor. The young man made a movement to assist him, but the Count waved him off.

"No, no, she is mine now;" he murmured, "mine alone. The king decided for us. The king of death!" and he laughed again.

Loris stood hesitating in the centre of the room, surveying the limp figure of the Countess, which her husband had borne to the sofa. The dark face of the Count was now lighted by a triumphant smile as he leant towards her.

The young man, stifled by the heavy perfume of the room, with fire in his heart, felt a sudden weakness assail him.

"Before noon to-morrow," he murmured, and tottered unsteadily from the place, down the dark passage, and so into the street, like a man walking in his sleep.

The cool night air revived him, but, with the return of consciousness to the present, he was assailed with the horrors of his situation. He was not a coward, but he knew that he had been guiltless of wrong towards the Count: that a harmless flirtation, born of a woman's coquetry, had led him to sacrifice his life.

To-day he was happy-hearted, filled with the joy of living. To-morrow he would be a cold and pulseless thing, to be hurried to a suicide's grave. He was only twenty-five, and it was hard, very hard to die so young.

He half closed his eyes as he hurried along, dreading to look at the familiar houses and cafés that lined the avenue, lest the thought of all that he must leave might fill him with added anguish.

He knew that when he passed again through that highway now flashing like a double strand of diamonds with its myriad lights, it would be in a musty coach with sombre plumes followed by impatient mourners.

As he ascended heavily the stairs leading to his chambers, it seemed as if every step led him down into the abyss of death, and the pulsations of his heart were like a hammer rising and falling, beating out his life.

Wearily he entered his room, bidding his servant go to bed, asking to be awakened early on the morrow. He had no intention of evading his promise to the Count. He would kill himself before the clock sounded the hour of noon on the morrow.

The grey light of dawn found him still arranging his papers, writing letters to his friends. How surprised they would be to hear that he, the rich, fêted, well-beloved Loris Nudiolanski, had taken French leave of the world for good. They would talk about it a week—two weeks, perhaps—in perfumed boudoirs. Then Loris, the suicide, would be forgotten.

His last preparations made, he took out a pistol from his duelling case, cleaned it thoroughly, and put in a new cartridge. He made ready the other in case the first should fail.

"If I wait until broad daylight," he said to himself, "someone may arrive to prevent my taking my life. It is better to do it now before all the world is awake. While they are sleeping, I shall sleep, too."

He poured himself out a glass of brandy; it steadied his hand; there was even a flush of colour in his face as he raised the pistol to his head.

A report followed, filling the small room with a dense smoke. When the veil lifted, Loris was still standing. At his feet a man lay with his hand pressed hard against his breast.

"Borisloff!" cried Loris, scarcely believing that it was his old enemy that lay at his feet. "In Heaven's name what does this mean?"

"It means," gasped Borisloff, "That I got here—just—in time—to save you—to do justice. Remember—I died an honourable man. Here—take back your pistol."

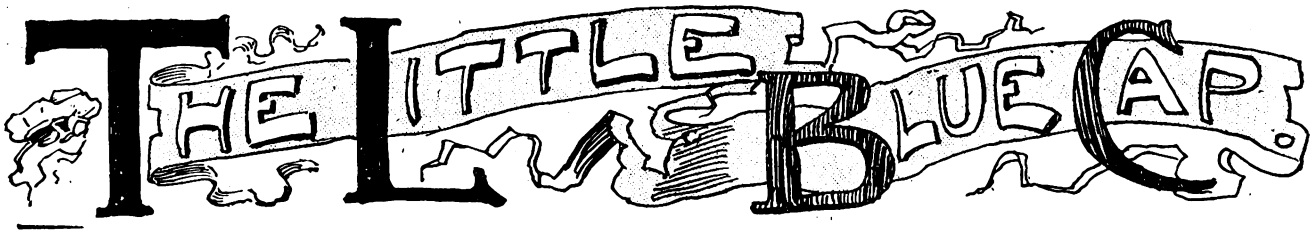
"But I lost. I was only carrying out my promise."

"You did not lose——" the dying man murmured.

"You——"

"I cheated."

And he rolled over dead!



I WAS paying a visit to my friends, the Durands. They were a simple, honest couple who lived near the banks of the river, in a tiny house, a mere bird's nest, almost hidden by wisteria and Virginia creeper. Durand's hands bore the marks of honest toil, for he had been a locksmith in his youth, and had by industry and economy raised himself steadily until he became the proprietor of a large business, and secured a competency for his old age. His wife, a quiet, gentle creature, worshipped her husband, and both of them wore on their faces an expression of serenity which betokened ease of conscience and a life of peace.

Durand was past sixty years of age, and his wife must have been fifty, yet, in spite of their wrinkles and grey hairs, these two treated each other with an affectionate deference which was a pleasure to behold.

While we were engaged in conversation just before dinner, Durand rose and opened a drawer to take out some trifle which he wished to show to me. While he was turning over the contents of the drawer, it chanced that a little cap, such as might have been worn by a doll, or an infant, fell to the floor. I picked it up, and noticed that it was made of coarse blue linen, with bits of twine instead of ribbons. As I handed it to him, I said gaily:

"Are you preparing a baby basket, Papa Durand?"

I had no sooner spoken than I regretted it, for I recollected at that moment having heard that the only shadow on my friend's life was the fact of their union being a childless one. For a minute Durand made no reply, but looked at the little cap affectionately; then as he laid it carefully away again, he said in a tone of seriousness:

Digitized by Google

"That is a souvenir."

Then we three sat down for dinner and talked of other matters, but as soon as the repast was finished, and the little maid-of-all-work had put cigars and liqueurs upon the table, my friend said suddenly:

"How much that baby cap reminds me of!" It was evident that he wanted to explain his remark, and I begged him to do so.

"It was a great many years ago," he said after a slight pause, "for I was about twelve years old. I was working in a large factory, and I had a companion, of the same age as myself, whom, on account of his ugly features, we nicknamed Zizi Monkey-face. He was a sly, thieving, mischievous urchin, very much given to filching tarts from the pastry-cook's counter, but a jolly little chap, and full of pluck. He was so lazy that he would have been turned out of the factory had it not been for the indulgence of the overseer, who had been a friend of his father's, and took an interest in the boy for the sake of his dead comrade. Monkey-face was an orphan, and the only relative he had ever known was the woman who brought him up, a cousin of his mother. This woman was a fish-peddler, a brawling, brutal creature, whose affection for her young charge was manifested only by blows. Perhaps if he had known a parent's love he would have been less perverse.

"One afternoon, the lad took it into his head to run away from the factory, and go vagabonding about with a gang of young ruffians like himself. As they were coming slowly home after nightfall, they heard, to their astonishment, the cry of an infant. The sound seemed to issue from a long, narrow, dirty alley which opened on the street, and at the other end of which hung a dimly flickering lamp. After a short consultation, the street boys ventured softly into the passage, and one of them espied, behind the door, a little bundle of rags which struggled and wailed. He seized hold of it, and the whole party ran into the street, triumphant, stopping under a lamp to examine their capture. It proved to be a baby girl a few weeks old, wrapped up in a series of dirty cloths, a poor little innocent whom a wretched, perhaps desperate, mother had abandoned to the charity of strangers.

"A council was held to decide what should be done with the booty, and the young captors gave free play to their mischievous imaginations. One wanted to put the baby back where they had found it; another, to hide it in a half-empty prune box which stood at a grocer's door; a third proposed to climb up to a second storey balcony and leave the youngster there, and how astonished the people would be next day! But Zizi Monkey-face scouted all these ideas, and declared that the baby must be given to the gypsies. There was a band of these people near by, who practised jugglery and fortune-telling, and instances of kidnapping were by no means rare.

"Monkey-face's decision was hailed with enthusiasm, and he claimed the right to carry the treasure-trove in consideration of his having made the plan.

"'Give us the kid,' he said. The baby had all this time been screaming piteously, but it stopped suddenly when Monkey-face took hold of it, and, while he walked along with an air of triumph, it fixed its great blue eyes upon his ugly face and smiled, at the same time stretching its tiny hands out as if to caress him.

"'She is laughing!' cried the boy in delight; 'see how she looks at me!'

"Then a new impulse seized him.

"'I will not give her away,' he said. 'I will keep her myself.'

"His companions protested indignantly, but in vain, for, as they well knew, Zizi Monkey-face had at the end of each arm an argument so strong that it would be useless, as well as unsafe, to oppose his wishes.

"When he reached home with his burden the fish-peddler exclaimed furiously:

"'Do you think I have not enough to do to fill your mouth, you lazy imp? Take that brat to the police—quick, now!' Pif, paf! A box on each ear showed the boy that she was in earnest, and he fled from the house.

"That night he did not return, and the next morning he was in the factory as soon as it opened, for the first time in his life.

"'Mr George,' he said timidly to the overseer, 'how much will you pay me if I work hard all day?'

"'I have already told you tenpence,' answered the man in surprise; and Monkey-face worked indefatigably until night. The overseer, amazed and delighted at the change, paid the boy for his work and even gave him tenpence in advance in order to encourage him.

"That night Monkey-face was again absent from his home, and his cousin, the fish peddler, went to the factory the next evening, lay in wait for him, and dragged him home in spite of his struggles, administering a thrashing on the way. But it was no use; as soon as the old woman turned her back to cook the soup for dinner, the boy slipped out of the house and did not return.

"The factory overseer having been informed of the state of affairs, made up his mind to settle the matter at once, by finding out where Monkey-face spent his nights, and for this purpose watched the lad as he left the factory. Mr George, in company with one of the workmen, followed the wanderer at a short distance, and observed him enter a bakery and buy a small loaf of bread; next he went into a dairy and came out carrying a bottle of milk, and then turned his steps towards a lonely, deserted quarter near the river. Suddenly his followers saw him plunge into a muddy alley; the place having no lamps was as dark as an oven, but Monkey-face was dimly visible as he stopped before a paling. The next minute he had scaled it with the agility of the animal which was his namesake, and was out of sight.

"The two men, determined to discover his hiding-place, climbed over the wall and found themselves in a large vacant piece of land covered with weeds and rubbish, but of Monkey-face there was not a sign!

"At last they espied in the farthest corner a low wooden shed which had evidently once served as a fowl-house, and through the cracks of which a faint light was shining. They approached it noiselessly and peered through a crack. Great was their astonishment. In the middle of the wretched hut, in which a man would not have been able to stand upright, sat the young runaway, a candle-end stuck in the ground beside him; he was gravely pouring milk into a feeding bottle, and in a corner, on a bed of dried leaves, a baby was sleeping soundly, wrapped up in an old blanket.

"Zizi Monkey-face transformed into a nurse!

"'What the dickins are you doing here?' asked the overseer, throwing open the door of the cabin suddenly; and the boy, startled at first by the intrusion, soon recovered himself and answered slowly:

"'Haven't I got a right to have a little sister?'

"Then, after a pause, he added grandly, 'I earn tenpence a day. That is enough for us both, and we don't ask anyone for anything.'"

The narrator paused, smiled softly and added:

"The next day the owner of the factory, being informed of the matter, raised my pay to one-and-eightpence — just double."

"What?" I cried. "It was you."

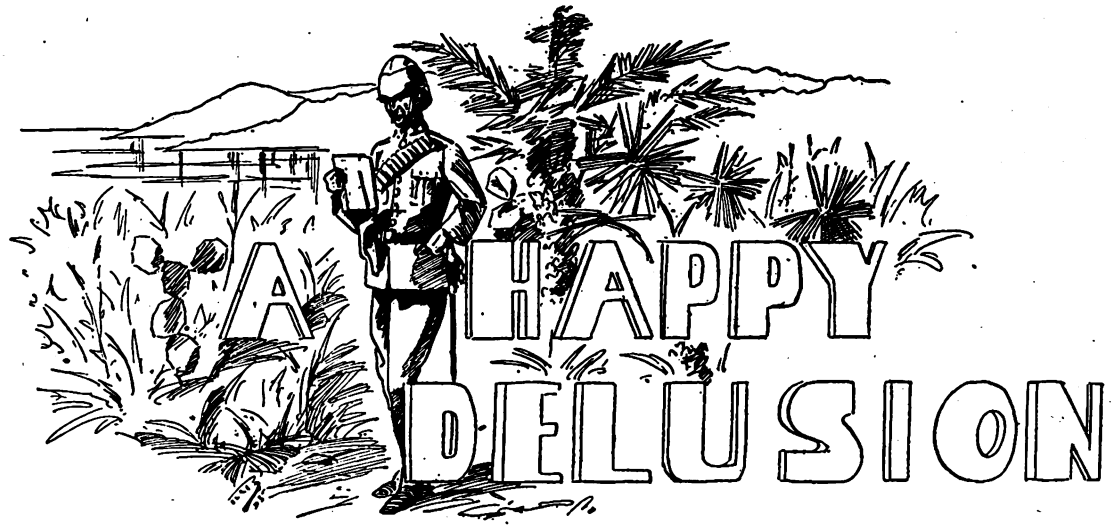
"Ah, I have betrayed myself," said Durand. "Yes, I was the young rascal who was in a fair way to come to the gallows, and, thanks to the blue eyes of that little girl, I became a good workman, and afterwards set up for myself. Now you understand why I kept that little blue cap; she had it on when we found her."

"And what has become of her?" I asked eagerly.

The old man answered: "We have never parted." Then, smiling, he looked at his wife and added: "Have we, my dear?"

She smiled in return, but her eyes were moist as she looked at him, and under her eyelids I saw a tear-drop glistening.

Digitized by Google



A HAPPY DELUSION

WHEN Lieutenant Skipton took the train for Portchester that August evening his heart had sunk somewhere near the bottom of his boots, for had not his regiment been ordered on active service? And even when the war scare in Egypt should be over, it was unlikely he would be able to return home for some time, for was it not next on the list for India? And so—well, it was not a pleasant thought, but he must pull himself together and face it.

He was going to say good-bye to Daisy Stuart, to look into her pretty eyes, and watch them darken whilst he told his news. She would be interested, he felt sure, but would that be all?

The stretch of dusty road from the station had never seemed so long and weary to Claude Skipton before. The air was full of sounds of the dying day, and fragrant odours from cottage gardens reached him; but he saw and heard nothing till he opened the gate of the Stuart's pretty house, and walked up the sheltered path.

Out of the French windows came the notes of Daisy's sweet voice singing. Claude paused in the verandah to listen. Ah! no more duets for them, he knew, unless——but would she? As the music died away he entered the little drawing-room unannounced. It was dark coming in out of the summer twilight, but he could see Mrs. Stuart slumbering peacefully in a chair, and the Colonel trying to read by the failing light, while at the piano sat Daisy, wearing a white dress, and somebody stood by her side—somebody who was tall and handsome, though possibly some twenty years her senior, yet who assuredly had his hand on Daisy's bent head, and who was caressing the pretty curls as Claude had never dared to do. Instinctively he felt the presence of a rival, and his eyes flashed as Colonel Stuart rather stiffly introduced "Lord Cantley."

He entered the little drawing-room unannounced.

Claude was not at his best, as he abruptly spoke of Egypt and his orders. Perhaps he wanted to cause that sudden start from Daisy, and that look, half wonderment, half pain, that she gave him.

"You will have fighting—I know you will," she said childishly.

"Possibly; that's what we're going for," he answered, and in a few moments took his leave, feeling strangely dissatisfied.

Perhaps she guessed what was passing in his mind, for she smiled sweetly at him as she gave him her hand, and, emboldened by that, he ventured to ask if she would not walk with him to the gate. She acquiesced, after a moment's hesitation, and then said:

"Why not go the field way? It is nicer."

They strolled across the lawn in silence, till Claude said: "I have something to show you," and drew from an inner pocket a small packet wrapped in white paper. It proved to be an opal, on which some hand had sketched the portrait of a pretty girl, with a sweet wild-rose face, and eyes like shady violets.

Daisy looked at it, saying simply, "This is meant for me, but it is much too flattering."

"It could not be that, darling," answered Claude.

He had not meant to call her "darling." The word slipped out, and he looked anxiously to see if she noticed it.

She bit her lip nervously, and turned her face away.

"Of course it is too pretty to be like me," she said naturally, "but I think you are very clever to paint so well,

Digitized by Google

Lieutenant Skipton. I won't deprive you of it. You must keep it as a souvenir of our Portchester days."

She laid the little picture in his hands. He carefully wrapped it up, and replaced it in his pocket without a word. They had reached the little gate by this time. On the other side of it was a brook crossed by a plank bridge, and beyond that stretched the pathway across the fields. Daisy was the first to open the gate, and turned it idly to and fro. Then she held out her hand, saying:

"Good-bye, I must go now."

He took it, their eyes met; then she drew her hand away and would have left him, but his arm was round her.

"Daisy, Daisy, it must never be 'good-bye' between us."

He drew her closer, but she tore herself away, saying rather wildly:

"Don't, don't; it must be 'good-bye.' I am engaged to Lord Cantley."

Claude was petrified. They stood facing each other, she with bent head and nervously clasped hands.

"Don't say that, dear," said he, at last; "tell me it is not true."

"It has been true a long time," she answered.

"Then why did you not enlighten me before?" he exclaimed unsteadily.

"I couldn't," she whispered. "I thought you knew. I never guessed it would come to this, and——"

She paused.

"Do you love him, Daisy?"

She drew herself up with a quaint, womanly air.

"You must not ask me that. I am going to marry him." Then, with a pang of self-reproach at the pained look on her lover's face, she added, "We are poor, you know, and he is rich; and he will do such a lot for the boys; and Etta, and Mabel, and Charles, and Clarice can all come and stay with me. Mother wished it, and he is good and kind, and I——"

Then the brave little voice broke. She covered her face with her hands, and leant her elbows on the gate.

"I am poor," Claude muttered. "I can offer you none of these things."

Then he looked away across the fields, with a fierce hunger in his heart.

A red glow lingered in the sky, the pale crescent of the moon rose slowly, and the stars came twinkling out. A spray of honeysuckle from the adjacent hedge was blown down, and caught on Daisy's curls. Claude released it, and she, raising a very white face from the gate, once more extended her hand, and whispered "Good-bye."

She drew herself up with a quaint, womanly air.

"This is good-bye? It is only a dream, then, Daisy, and I must forget it?"

"Only a dream, but do not forget it."

They were her last words. One handclasp and the two had parted.

The spray of honeysuckle, faded and shrivelled, all the sweetness gone from it, as it had gone from his dream, was placed by Claude with the little portrait, and together they went with him to Egypt and thence to India.

. . . .

Years passed. The dust lay thick and white at Mean Meer. The insufferable heat seemed to penetrate into every bungalow. In that of Lieutenant Thurstan, where the punkah was being briskly pulled over the poor young officer, as he lay wasted from incessant days and nights of fever, it was perhaps cooler. But the throbbing brain of the lad could think of nothing but the green depths of English woods, and the dainty loveliness of the girl he had left behind him. He fancied that if her small palm could but rest upon his burning forehead he should get well.

There was a clank of spurs on the verandah, and his chum and Captain entered.

"Well, my boy, how are you?" and tenderly as a woman the elder man shook up the pillows before he sat down beside the bed. He was fond of, and much interested in his junior subaltern, the latest joined fellow in the regiment, who had not been six months in the country before the Punjab fever had stricken him down.

"I've had an awful night, Captain. If this goes on there'll be those growling volleys shot over me in a few days. And I shouldn't much care, if it wasn't for her."

He jerked his head feebly in the direction of some photographs upon a small table beside him, which his senior had not previously noticed. Now his gaze was glued to them, and he did not attempt to cheer the poor boy.

"Who's that?" he asked shortly.

It was a panel portrait of a beautiful woman in widow's weeds. There was a companion one to it of three charming girls, at which Skipton hardly glanced. Young Thurstan followed his look.

"They are all my cousins," he said.

"I used to know that one, I think, once," said the Captain slowly. "Lady Cantley, if I am not mistaken?"

"Yes. Oh! then if you knew Daisy you will not mind writing a letter for me. I've tried, and my hand's so shaky; but I could not bear—if anything happened to me, and she did not hear, she'd break her heart. But you'll write at my dictation, won't you, and then you'll send it with a line of your own afterwards?"

Skipton hesitated.

"Break her heart? Daisy? Was this boy, then, so much to her? Yet how could he refuse?"

"I didn't know that Lady Cantley was a widow?" he said, temporising.

"Yes, just a year. I never mentioned them to you because, of course, one doesn't talk about that sort of thing—unless, indeed, it happens to 'run smooth,' and our 'course' unfortunately hasn't. But if I'd known that you were friends—— Anyway, you will write, won't you? My head is pretty clear now, but I can't tell how long it will last."

"I'll fetch some paper and ink," said Skipton, rising.

"It's all on that table," said the lad, watching him with feverish anxiety.

My Darling,—By the time this reaches you it will be all over with me. I told you in my last that I had fever. Unluckily it's gaining ground, thanks to this awful climate, and I fear the next few days will see me out. I shouldn't mind so much if it wasn't for you. Life is not worth twopence in this country, and yet this is all I have to look forward to, grilling for the next ten years, at least. So much for being a beggarly sub. Perhaps it is for the best, darling; yet, when I think of you, it seems awfully hard luck. Try not to fret too much, and remember I loved you always. The past is ours; nothing can take it from us; and your future is assured to you. You have a happy home, and will never want for anything. That's some consolation. Some day we may meet again; for the present, good-bye. I can't write any more—at least, my captain is doing it for me; such a good fellow; be nice to him if you ever have the chance, for my sake. God bless you, my dearest.—Ever your loving THOROLD.

Digitized by Google

"Is that all?" asked Skipton, grimly.

"Yes," replied the boy; he was faint, and for the next few moments the Captain had no time to think.

Then he put the letter away carefully and waited. What would she think when she read it, he wondered. Would she recognise his writing—this sweet, false woman, who had implied the love for him that she dared not utter seven years ago—the love that he had believed in, the memory of which had sustained him and kept him straight as nothing else could? And now she had forgotten him—if, indeed, she ever really cared—forgotten him for this boy. She had been freed, and now she was free no longer. But with that came the thought that Thorold Thurstan would die, and then he crushed it as unworthy of himself and traitorous to the lad, who had been to him as a younger brother.

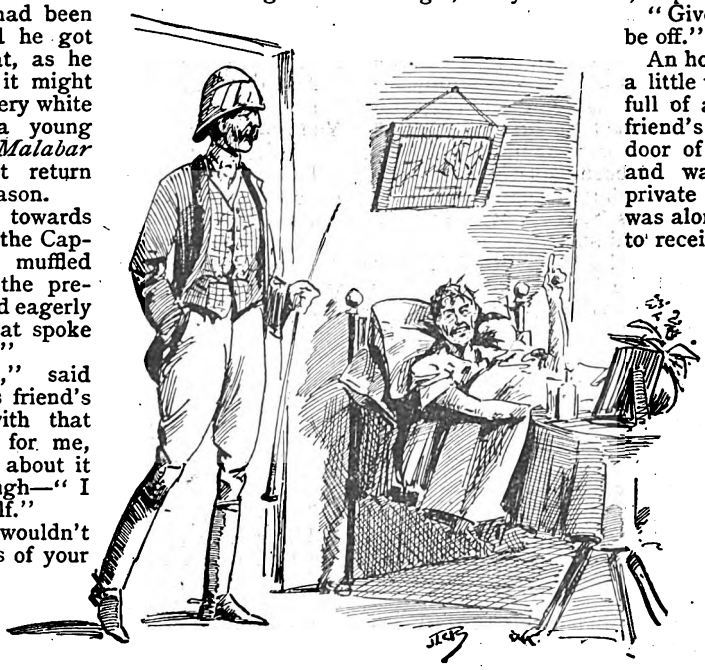
. . . . . .

Thorold Thurstan did not die. The next mail brought him news of a large legacy that had been left him unexpectedly, and he got better on the strength of that, as he remembered the happiness it might bring him. Yet it was a very white and shaky specimen of a young soldier that the good ship Malabar took home, upon her first return voyage the next trooping season.

As the ship glided in towards Portsmouth Harbour, he and the Captain stood on deck, warmly muffled up, but already enjoying the precarious English sunshine, and eagerly watching every landmark that spoke of that magic word "home."

"By the way, Skipton," said young Thurstan, taking his friend's arm, "what did you do with that letter—the one you wrote for me, you know? I forgot to ask about it since"—with a happy laugh—"I have been able to write myself."

"I have it safe enough. I wouldn't destroy it, lest, in the excess of your jubilation, you did some mad thing that might bring on a relapse, and then it would have come in useful after all."



His chum and Captain entered.

The joke was a bad one, ill-timed, and poor, but Thurstan felt he could afford to laugh at everything.

"Oh, keep it by all means," he rejoined, "keep it and give it to—my little girl the first chance you get."

"I shall probably not see her."

"Why, of course you will. You are not going to desert me, Captain, now, after all you've been to me. I thought you'd stand by me, and be my best man," diffidently.

"No, really, Thurstan, choose someone of your own age," replied the Captain.

The young man laughed.

"Anyway, you must see me through it. I suppose you want to be off to town at once, but you'll stop long enough to see her? You must. I wrote to her that we were coming home together in this ship, and she'll be looking out for us, and think it awfully rude of you if you go off without seeing her. They are sure to be down here—stopping at the Beach Mansions, I expect; that's where George always put up."

"Who is George?"

"Didn't you know him? The late Lord Cantley; so Daisy would be sure to go there. You see, a girl can't go about alone, so her sister would come too; besides, she lives with her at present."

The explanation was not very clear, but Skipton concluded that one of Daisy's younger sisters would be with her as "gooseberry," and he would be wanted to make a fourth, and keep the gooseberry occupied. Well, he was getting hardened, and he thought he might as well go through with it.

"All right, I'll come," he muttered. "But do you think they'll be on the jetty?"

"No. Probably not. Fancy meeting your sweetheart, 'after many days,' in the face of this crowd! Bad enough if it was one's mother or sister; but your own girl—no, thank you!"

All the same, Thurstan was feverishly scanning the welcoming sea of faces. He grew pale with excitement as the trooper was attached to the quay and the gangways let down.

"They are not here," said Skipton at last. "Take a cab and go straight off to the hotel. I'll see to the traps, and come off as soon as I can."

"Here's a letter," replied Thurstan, snatching one from the saloon table, where he had been hastily hunting among the scattered dozens of envelopes. "Yes," he added, reading it, "they are there, both of them, of course—Daisy and Clarice. I'll go; but you'll come, Captain?" doubtfully.

"Give you my word I will. There, be off."

An hour or two later Claude Skipton, a little weary, a little heart-sore, but full of an unselfish sympathy in his friend's happiness, drew up before the door of the Beach Mansions Hotel, and was shown to Lady Cantley's private sitting-room. Her ladyship was alone, and came forward smiling to receive him. Could this be Daisy—this graceful, queenly woman, with a pale, beautiful face, and hair like molten gold? The little Portchester girl he had left behind him had become a regal dame, he thought; and still Thurstan had called her his "little girl!" But as she greeted him with outstretched hands the lily blossomed into the rose, her pale cheeks were dyed with blushes, and no schoolgirl's eyes shone with a more tender light.

"All for him," thought Claude, as he bowed over her hand.

"Thorold told us to expect you. I am so glad that you have come," she said, almost shyly.

He glanced round the room.

"You have seen Thorold?"

"Oh, yes; he is here—in the conservatory with Clarice."

"I have a letter for you, Lady Cantley, which I wrote at his dictation when he was at the worst, and it was not destroyed."

She took it from him and read it slowly.

"But this was meant for Clarice," she said. "Yes. Didn't you know? Thorold and Clarice have been engaged for some time, but they had no prospect of—— Oh, Claude!"

"It was all my stupid mistake," he said, as she laid her head upon his shoulder. "I never thought it could be one of your sisters—not you."

"And I wondered all the time if you were ever coming back!"

. . . . . .

"Thorold," said Claude Skipton, when that young man had proudly presented his Captain to pretty, child-like Clarice, "I've no special objection to being your best man, but it's usual on those occasions to enlist the offices of a bachelor; and as your example is so excellent, I'm going to follow it—or, rather, lead the way; so suppose we reverse the suggestion, and you act as my best man instead. It'll do just as well, as you can get another for yourself."

Digitized by Google

A WOMAN'S WILL.

WHERE she came from nobody knew. It was said Dorrick met her at a seaside resort, and that was all anyone seemed to know about her. He married her for her beauty: she married him for his money and social position.

That would have made no difference in the long run, if she had been an ordinary type of fortune-hunter. But she was not. She had gone into the business with her eyes wide open, and thoroughly understood that she had sold herself. She felt her degradation keenly, and within a month from her marriage began to despise herself, and wanted to be free again.

Dorrick, personally, she neither loved nor hated; he was an indulgent husband and a gentleman. But Dorrick in the abstract—the man who stood between her and her self-respect—she hated cordially.

Perhaps the last straw that broke down her endurance was when Dorrick came home tipsy from some club meeting. Dorrick was not a drinking man, and this was an exceptional case. Perhaps he had been drinking too many toasts to his young wife. But it was an offence against good form—the only thing she cared about now. When Dorrick ceased to be a gentleman the last link broke.

"My dear—" he began, and then he stopped short, for he had caught her glance. She had peculiar eyes sometimes—hard, cold, penetrating eyes—gimlet eyes, an irreverent youth had once called them. Dorrick seemed to shrink up within himself beneath her glance. In the condition he was, he seemed fascinated—"like as if he'd been mesmerised," said Mrs. Dorrick's maid under her breath; she had been to see a professional hypnotist a few weeks before. Mrs. Dorrick overheard the remark, and it set her thinking.

The suggestion of mesmerism broke in upon her like a revelation; perhaps she had found the key to freedom. She had heard of this marvellous force that science but dimly comprehends, and she was prepared to believe wonders of it. Forthwith she set about studying it.

Little by little, as she mastered the subject, she came to understand how complete is the control exercised by the mesmerist over his subjects, and found that she herself possessed marked powers of fascination. Then she began to try experiments with her husband. She had no definite end in view. She wanted to gain such mastery over him as to make him entirely subservient to her will. Then she would no longer be galled by the sense that she was part of his property. The end was a foregone conclusion.

She began tentatively. Dorrick developed a habit of dressing a little too lightly for the season of the year, and caught cold several times. His wife scolded him for the carelessness, but to no purpose. Little by little he became more careless. He neglected to see a doctor, after catching a very severe cold, though he had been in the habit of taking the utmost care of his health. Again his wife scolded him, and sent for the doctor herself. Dorrick recovered slowly, but the effects of a severe chill had left him weaker.

Then he committed the crowning imprudence of taking a cold bath in the middle of January, and neglected to thoroughly dry himself. Mrs. Dorrick scolded again, and again summoned the doctor. The doctor was angry, and took Dorrick to task sharply for his carelessness. "It's simple suicide," he said, "simple suicide!" And he left directions for Mrs. Dorrick, and drove away.

He was right; he could do no good; Dorrick had thrown away his life. In about a week he fell a victim to pneumonia, and Mrs. Dorrick was free.

Mrs. Dorrick, the bride of scarce six months, mourned deeply for her husband, and inherited his wealth. Perhaps there was just a little genuineness in her sorrow; a tinge of remorse—but nothing more. To-day she is a leader in society by right of her late husband's name and wealth, her youth, her beauty, and her sorrow. Perhaps she may marry again; this time she will not sell herself—she will not need to. And the man of her choice will be accounted happy; for no one knows of her terrible gift. Perhaps, too, rightly so accounted. Who shall say?

OUT OF RHYME.

I AM a genius. These dolts here say that I am insane. But what do they know of genius?

Bah! it is absurd. It is impossible for me to be a genius and also insane. You know that; you are a well-read man. You can recall the passage, can you not? It proves the sanity of true genius. And I am a true genius.

How do I know? Oh, I have always been a genius.

I knew it first when I began to read books. It said, in the books, that a genius and a poet are born, not made.

Then I knew at once that I was a genius.

Always, I loved poetry. I knew that some day I should write a great poem. I determined to wait for the psychological moment. Meanwhile, I was a genius.

Everything confirmed this. I was an eccentric child, wilful, visionary, whimsical. You remember, do you not, that the books say that genius is eccentric?

Day by day I became a greater genius. I wrote beautiful poems. I dare say you remember them; my name was——

Genius! Genius! It is a beautiful word, is it not?

But the world does not like it. Oh, I knew that.

I have always been a great reader. Perhaps I told you that. And genius always makes every one about it unhappy.

As I grew older I resolved to marry.

I knew we should be unhappy. Men of genius always are. You remember Lord Byron and Carlyle?

We led a miserable existence. Because I was a genius.

I wondered more and more why my genius was not conceded. I had lived up to everything as it is in the books.

I am very fond of those books.

One night I woke up suddenly.

I knew the moment was come. I was going to write my great poem. It was to be a work of infinite genius.

I got up softly and lit the lamp. My wife slept.

Quietly I took up my pen and ink.

There was a beautiful rhythm in my mind.

Then something discordant disturbed me.

Suddenly my eye fell upon my sleeping wife.

Then I knew what had disturbed me.

SHE WAS OUT OF RHYME!

Think of it! I was a poet, and my wife did not rhyme.

For a moment I was stunned. The great poem waited.

I could not go on while she did not rhyme.

If you were a poet you would understand.

I looked at her again and considered.

It was too true. She should have ended with a dactyl; instead, it was an anapæst.

She was not only out of rhyme. She did not scan.

I could bear it no longer. She must be made to rhyme.

I knew just where the fault lay. I cut off her head.

I had to cut more than once, but my razor was strong as well as sharp.

It was so sudden that she only rolled her eyes and groaned.

I did not care for that. I knew that she rhymed now.

Then I dipped my pen into the blood, and continued my poem. Oh, how the genius oozed out of my pen!

The thought, the language, the metre, the rhythm—oh, it was genius! For she was in rhyme now, you know.

So I wrote until morning.

And then, when they came to know why blood flowed under the door, I told them it was rhyme, and showed them the poem.

And they—monstrous!—put me in this place, where they keep saying that I am insane.

If you could only see my poem you would know what I am.

I am not insane. I am a genius.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,

Hyson Green Works,

NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker.

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE

All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

HAIR DESTROYED

Root and Branch absolutely exterminated without injury to the skin, entirely new treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

NOSE

A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE. Medically approved for Red Noses, 3/9 post free, under cover. Pamphlet "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1/-. Machines for Ugly Noses. Particulars for stamp

Lees Ray, Specialist, Wavertree, Liverpool.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticisms, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. Horn, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

OVER 2,000 New and Secondhand. EASY TERMS

—From 10s. per month. Lists (200 page) and Testimonials post free. British Cycle Manufacturing Co., Liverpool; 45, Everton Road, and 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W. (close to Euston Road).

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

Ottey's Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,

Gothic House, 9, Erskine Street, Liverpool.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs "T. D.," 37, Strand, London.

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS

FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. Herbal Institute, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

ECZEMA

and Skin Diseases of all kinds can be cured at once if you

Use "ANTEXEMA."

This is sold by all Chemists and Drug Stores, or may be had post free for 1s 8d., 2s. 9d., or 4s. 9d., of the ANTEXEMA Co., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W.—Drop a post-card to us, mentioning this paper, and we will send you, post free, a Little Book, containing valuable information about Skin Diseases of all kinds.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free. Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,

8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

RUPTURE CURED WITHOUT OPERATION, S. J. Sherman, Hernia Specialist, 64, Chancery Lane, London; 26, King Street, Manchester; now sends his new Book of full information, post free, 7d.

IMPORTANT ☞ TO LADIES. Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science: they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,

52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.

(Established 1851.)

TO INVENTORS.

An Invention Protected for £1. Handbook, "How to Patent an Invention," giving full particulars, forms, &c., free from Hughes & Young, "Patent Editors" to the principal newspapers, 23, Coleman Street, London, E.C. Established 1829. Inventors assisted in working or selling Inventions. Read "Patents."

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. Holt, (Rooms O), Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

ONE BOX OF

DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use

Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.

1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY, Balham Hill, London, S.W.

Beware of injurious imitations.

New Harrison. Swift Gold Medal.

KNITTER

KNITS STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" & "SUN" Machines.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

All communications relating to the Advertisement Spaces in this Publication should in future be addressed to the Advertisement Manager,

"SHORT STORIES," PEARSON'S WEEKLY BUILDINGS, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

ADVERTISERS should write for Particulars of the positions available. Announcements carefully designed and displayed.

Digitized by Google

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

FOR THE SMALL SUM OF 6s. 6d. WE WILL SEND AS FOLLOWS:—

NOT A TOY.

We give you A WATCH.

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.	FOR 6s. 6d.
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsome

KEYLESS WATCHES,

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

"Lowick-by-Beale, Northumberland, August 17.

"GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.

"Very truly yours,
"WILLIAM McISAAC."

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

"11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

"GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.

"I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,
"LEWIS C. RHODES."

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation. Money returned if not as represented.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call, or send to-day for the

6s. 6d. MONSTER PRESENTATION PARCEL INCLUDING THE HANDSOME KEYLESS WATCH.

GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID SERIAL STORY JUST STARTED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 338. FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 22, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

Enquire at

SINGER'S

ABOUT

Presentation

OF

FIVE THOUSAND

5/- ART SETS

For Executing ART NEEDLEWORK similar to that on view at SINGER'S numerous Show Rooms.

Can be Learned Easily.

Can be Worked Cheaply by a New Process.

Our New Machine does both Plain Sewing and Art Work.

INSTRUCTION FREE.

THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY,

CITY SHOW ROOMS: 147, CHEAPSIDE, E.C.

Branch Offices Everywhere.

GOOD AND LASTING EMPLOYMENT TO INDUSTRIOUS MEN WHETHER EXPERIENCED OR NOT.

Digitized by Google

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,
E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE
All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES. Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science: they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

ONE BOX OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS
will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.
To whiten the hands and skin, use
Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.
1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.
S. HARVEY, Balham Hill, London, S.W.
Beware of injurious imitations.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.
Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

EMPLOYMENT FOR LADIES!

Ladies possessing a type-writer can qualify themselves at home in three to six months as expert typists, and £2 upwards weekly may be realised anywhere by competent lady operators owning a type-writing machine. We specially invite young ladies to write at once for lowest cash prices of some of our first-class instruments. Remingtons, Yosts, Caligraphs, Bar-locks, and all the leading makes of type-writers supplied at enormous reductions from manufacturers' prices. Tuition Gratis. Every machine guaranteed. Numerous testimonials. Apply for further particulars to the Standard Type-Writer Depôt, 4, Grosvenor Street, Hanley. Manager, THOMAS LARGE.

ESAULINE, Reg. Trade Mark.

EVERY YOUNG MAN can positively and speedily cultivate a HEAVY HANDSOME MOUSTACHE by a few applications of "ESAULINE or POMADE D'ESAU," the newly discovered Hair-forcing (specific. Success guaranteed. Will not stain or injure the most delicate skin. Post free (under plain covers), 1/3, 2/9, & 5/-. KNOWLES & CO., Savoy House, 115, Strand, London, W.C. A genuine Hair Producer and Restorer, absolutely unrivalled. Testimonials received daily.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, (Rooms O), Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

ECZEMA

and Skin Diseases of all kinds can be cured at once if you

Use "ANTEXEMA."

This is sold by all Chemists and Drug Stores, or may be had post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., or 4s. 9d., of the ANTEXEMA Co., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W.—Drop a post-card to us, mentioning this paper, and we will send you, post free, a Little Book, containing valuable information about Skin Diseases of all kinds.

TO INVENTORS.

An Invention Protected for £1. Handbook, "How to Patent an Invention," giving full particulars, forms, &c., free from HUGHES & YOUNG, "Patent Editors" to the principal newspapers, 23, Coleman Street, London, E.C. Established 1829. INVENTORS ASSISTED IN WORKING OR SELLING INVENTIONS. Read "Patents."

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.
JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

New Harrison. SWIFT GOLD MEDAL.

KNITTER

KNITS STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" & "SUN" Machines.
HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticisms, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 338.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 22, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

By Robert Barr.*

I.—The Self-conceit of the Twentieth Century.

I trust I am thankful that my life has been spared until I have seen that most brilliant epoch of the world's history—the middle of the twentieth century. It would be useless for any man to disparage the vast achievements of the past fifty years, and if I venture to call attention to the fact, now apparently forgotten, that the people of the nineteenth century succeeded in accomplishing many notable things, it must not be imagined that I intend thereby to discount in any measure the marvellous inventions of the present age.

Men have always been somewhat prone to look with a certain condescension upon those who lived fifty or a hundred years before them. This seems to me the especial weakness of the present age; a feeling of national self-conceit, which, when it exists, should at least be kept as much in the background as possible.

It will astonish many to know that such also was a failing of the people of the nineteenth century. They imagined themselves living in an age of progress, and while I am not foolish enough to attempt to prove that they did anything really worth recording, yet it must be admitted by any unprejudiced man of research that their inventions were at least stepping-stones to those of to-day. Although the telephone and telegraph, and all other electrical appliances, are now to be found only in our national museums, or in the private collections of those few men who take any interest in the doings of the last century, nevertheless, the study of the now obsolete science of electricity led up to the recent discovery of vibratory ether, which does the work of the world so satisfactorily.

The people of the nineteenth century were not fools, and although I am well aware that this statement will be received with scorn where it attracts any attention whatever, yet who can say that the progress of the next half-century may not be as great as that of the one now ended, and that the people of the next century may not look upon us with the same contempt which we feel towards those who lived fifty years ago?

Being an old man, I am, perhaps, a laggard who dwells in the past rather than the present; still, it seems to me that such an article as that which appeared recently in Blackwood from the talented pen of Prof. Mowbray, of Oxford University, is utterly unjustifiable. Under the title of "Did the People of London Deserve their Fate?" he endeavours to show that the simultaneous blotting-out of millions of human beings was a beneficial event, the good results of which we still enjoy.

According to him, Londoners were so dull-witted and stupid, so incapable of improvement, so sodden in the vice of mere money-gathering, that nothing but their total extinction would have sufficed, and that, instead of being an appalling catastrophe, the doom of London was an unmixed blessing. In spite of the unanimous approval with which this article has been received by the press, I still maintain that such writing is uncalled for, and that there is something to be said for the London of the nineteenth century.

II.—Why London, Warned, was Unprepared.

The indignation I felt in first reading the article alluded to stills remains with me, and it has caused me to write these words, giving some account of what I must still regard, in spite of the sneers of the present age, as the most terrible disaster that ever overtook a portion of the human race.

I shall not endeavour to place before those who read any record of the achievements pertaining to the time in question. But I would like to say a few words about the alleged stupidity of the people of London in making no preparations for a disaster regarding which they had continual and ever-recurring warning. They have been compared with the inhabitants of Pompeii making merry at the foot of a volcano.

In the first place, fogs were so common in London, especially in winter, that no particular attention was paid to them. They were merely looked upon as inconvenient annoyances, interrupting traffic, and prejudicial to health, but I doubt if anyone thought it possible for a fog to become one vast smothering mattress pressed down upon a whole metropolis, extinguishing life as if the city suffered from hopeless hydrophobia.

* As most of my readers are probably aware, Mr. Robert Barr was kind enough to write an appeal on behalf of the cause of the Fresh Air Fund, a few weeks back, which appeared in Pearson's Weekly. At the same time he suggested that I might reprint this remarkable story which came out some little time ago in "The Face and the Mask," published by Hutchinson & Co., and, certainly, if it does not arouse the sympathy of those who read it, nothing will. Even now there remains time to do something towards improving the condition of the inhabitants of London, and what surer way than by exerting ourselves to brighten and gladden the lives of the little children who will some day be citizens themselves?

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

I have read that victims bitten by mad dogs were formerly put out of their sufferings in that way, although I doubt much if such things were ever actually done, notwithstanding the charges of savage barbarity now made against the people of the nineteenth century.

Probably the inhabitants of Pompeii were so accustomed to the eruptions of Vesuvius that they gave no thought to the possibility of their city being destroyed by a storm of ashes and an overflow of lava. Rain frequently descended upon London, and if a rainfall continued long enough it would certainly have flooded the metropolis, but no precautions were taken against a flood from the clouds.

Why, then, should the people have been expected to prepare for a catastrophe from fog, such as there had never been any experience of in the world's history? The people of London were far from being the sluggish dolts present-day writers would have us believe.

III.—The Coincidence that Came At Last.

As fog has now been abolished both on sea and land, and as few of the present generation have even seen one, it may not be out of place to give a few lines on the subject of fogs in general, and the London fogs in particular, which through local peculiarities differed from all others. A fog was simply watery vapour rising from the marshy surface of the land or from the sea, or condensed into a cloud from the saturated atmosphere. In my day, fogs were a great danger at sea, for people then travelled by means of steamships that sailed upon the surface of the ocean.

Rain frequently descended upon London.

London at the end of the nineteenth century consumed vast quantities of a soft bituminous coal for the purpose of heating rooms and of preparing food. In the morning and during the day, clouds of black smoke were poured forth from thousands of chimneys. When a mass of white vapour arose in the night, these clouds of smoke fell upon the fog, pressing it down, filtering slowly through it, and adding to its density. The sun would have absorbed the fog but for the layer of smoke that lay thick above the vapour and prevented its rays reaching it. Once this condition of things prevailed, nothing could clear London but a breeze of wind from any direction. London frequently had a seven days' fog, but these two conditions never coincided until the last year of the last century. The coincidence, as everyone knows, meant death—death so wholesale that no war the earth has ever seen left such slaughter behind it. To understand the situation, one has only to imagine the fog taking the place of the ashes at Pompeii, and the coal smoke as being the lava that covered it. The result to the inhabitants in both cases was exactly the same.

IV.—The American who Wanted to Sell.

I was at the time confidential clerk to the house of Fulton, Brixton, & Co., a firm in Cannon Street dealing largely in chemicals and chemical apparatus. Fulton I never knew; he died long before my time. Sir John Brixton was my chief—knighted, I believe, for services to his party, or because he was an official in the City during some royal progress through it; I have forgotten which. My small room was next to his large one, and my chief duty was to see that no one had an interview with Sir John unless he was an important man or had important business. Sir John was a difficult man to see, and a difficult man to deal with when he was seen. He had little respect for most men's feelings, and none at all for mine. If I allowed a man to enter his room who should have been dealt with by one of the minor members of the company, Sir John made no effort to conceal his opinion of me.

One day, in the autumn of the last year of the century, an American was shown into my room. Nothing would do but he must have an interview with Sir John Brixton. I told him that it was impossible, as Sir John was extremely busy, but that if he explained his business to me I would lay it before Sir John at the first favourable opportunity. The American demurred at this, but finally accepted the inevitable. He was the inventor, he said, of a machine that would revolutionise life in London, and he wanted Fulton, Brixton, & Co. to become agents for it.

The machine, which he had in a small handbag with him, was of white metal, and it was so constructed that by turning an index it gave out more or less oxygen gas. The gas, I understood, was stored in the interior in liquid form under great pressure, and would last, if I remember rightly, for six months without re-charging. There was also a rubber tube with a mouthpiece attached to it, and the American said that if a man took a few whiffs a day he would experience beneficial results.

Now, I knew there was not the slightest use in showing the machine to Sir John, because we dealt in old-established British apparatus, and never in any of the new-fangled Yankee inventions. Besides, Sir John had a prejudice against Americans, and I felt sure this man would exasperate him, as he was a most cadaverous specimen of the race, with high nasal tones, and a most deplorable pronunciation, much given to phrases savouring of slang; and he exhibited a certain nervous familiarity of demeanour towards people to whom he was all but a complete stranger. It was impossible for me to allow such a man to enter the presence of Sir John Brixton, and, when he returned some days later, I explained to him, I hope with courtesy, that the head of the house regretted very much his inability to consider his proposal regarding the machine.

The ardour of the American seemed in no way dampened by this rebuff. He said I could not have explained the possibilities of the apparatus properly to Sir John; he characterised it as a great invention, and said it meant a fortune to whoever obtained the agency for it.

He hinted that other noted London houses were anxious to secure it, but for some reason not stated he preferred to deal with us. He left some printed pamphlets referring to the invention, and said he would call again.

V.—The American Sees Sir John.

Many a time I have since thought of that persistent American, and wondered whether he left London before the disaster, or was one of the unidentified thousands who were buried in unmarked graves. Little did Sir John think, when he expelled him with some asperity from his presence, that he was turning away an offer of life, and that the heated words he used were, in reality, a sentence of death upon himself.

For my own part, I regret that I lost my temper, and told the American his business methods did not commend themselves to me. Perhaps he did not feel the sting of this; indeed, I feel certain he did not, for, unknowingly, he saved my life. Be that as it may, he showed no resentment, but immediately asked me out to drink with him, an offer I was compelled to refuse.

But I am getting ahead of my story. Indeed, being unaccustomed to writing, it is difficult for me to set down events in their proper sequence. The American called upon me several times after I told him our house could not deal with him. He got into the habit of dropping in upon me unannounced, which I did not at all like, but I gave no instructions regarding his intrusions, because I had no idea of the extremes to which he was evidently prepared to go.

Digitized by Google

One day, as he sat near my desk reading a paper, I was temporarily called from the room. When I returned I thought he had gone, taking his machine with him, but a moment later I was shocked to hear his high nasal tones in Sir John's room alternating with the deep notes of my chief's voice, which apparently exercised no such dread upon the American as upon those who were more accustomed to them.

I at once entered the room, and was about to explain to Sir John that the American was there through no connivance of mine, when my chief asked me to be silent, and, turning to his visitor, requested him gruffly to proceed with his interesting narration. The inventor needed no second invitation, but went on with his glib talk, while Sir John's frown grew deeper, and his face became redder, under his fringe of white hair.

When the American had finished, Sir John roughly bade him begone and take his accursed machine with him. He said it was an insult for a person with one foot in the grave to bring a so-called health invention to a robust man who never had a day's illness. I do not know why he listened so long to the American, when he had made up his mind from the first not to deal with him, unless it was to punish me for inadvertently allowing a stranger to enter.

The interview distressed me exceedingly, as I stood there helpless, knowing Sir John was becoming more and more angry with every word the foreigner uttered, but, at last, I succeeded in drawing the inventor and his work into my own room and closing the door. I sincerely hoped that I would never see the American again, and my wish was gratified. He insisted on setting his machine going, and placing it on a shelf in my room. He asked me to slip it into Sir John's room some foggy day and note the effect. The man said he would call again, but he never did.

VI.—How the Smoke Held Down the Fog.

It was on a Friday that the fog came down upon us. The weather was very fine up to the middle of November that autumn. The fog did not seem to have anything unusual about it. I have seen many worse fogs than that appeared to be. As day followed day, however, the atmosphere became denser and darker, caused, I suppose, by the increasing volume of coal smoke poured out upon it. The peculiarity about those seven days was the intense stillness of the air. We were, although we did not know it, under an air-proof canopy, and were slowly, but surely, exhausting the life-giving oxygen around us, and replacing it by poisonous carbonic acid gas.

The newspapers were full of startling statistics.

Lying face downwards on the floor.

Scientific men have since showed that a simple mathematical calculation might have told us exactly when the last atom of oxygen would have been consumed; but it is easy to be wise after the event. The body of the greatest mathematician in England was found in the Strand. He came that morning from Cambridge.

During a fog there was always a marked increase in the death-rate, and on this occasion the increase was no greater than usual until the sixth day. The newspapers on the morning of the seventh were full of startling statistics, but at the time of going to press the full significance of the alarming figures was not realised. The editorials of the morning papers on the seventh day contained no warning of the calamity that was so speedily to follow their appearance.

I lived then at Ealing, a western suburb of London, and came up every morning to Cannon Street by a certain train. I had up to the sixth day experienced no inconvenience from the fog, and this was largely due I am convinced, to the unnoticed operations of the American machine. On the fifth and sixth days Sir John did not come to the City, but he was in his office on the seventh. The door between his room and mine was closed.

Shortly after ten o'clock I heard a cry in his room, followed by a heavy fall. I opened the door, and saw Sir John lying face downwards on the floor. Hastening towards him, I felt for the first time the deadly effect of the deoxygenised atmosphere, and, before I reached him, I fell, first on one knee, and then headlong.

I realised that my senses were leaving me, and instinctively crawled back to my own room, where the oppression was at once lifted, and I stood again upon my feet, gasping. I closed the door of Sir John's room, thinking it filled with poisonous fumes, as, indeed, it was. I called loudly for help, but there was no answer. On opening the door to the main office, I met again what I thought was the noxious vapour. Speedily as I closed the door, I was impressed by the intense silence of the usually busy office, and saw that some of the clerks were motionless on the floor, and others sat with their heads on their desks as if asleep.

Digitized by Google

Even at this awful moment I did not realise that what I saw was common to all London, and not, as I imagined, a local disaster, caused by the breaking of some carboys in our cellar. (It was filled with chemicals of every kind, of whose properties I was ignorant, dealing as I did with the accountant, and not with the scientific side of the business.)

I opened the only window in my room, and again shouted for help. The street was silent and dark in the ominously still fog, and what now froze me with horror was meeting the same deadly, stifling atmosphere that was in the rooms. In falling I brought down the window and shut out the poisonous air.

Again I revived, and slowly the true state of things began to dawn upon me. I was in an oasis of oxygen. I at once surmised that the machine on my shelf was responsible for the existence of this oasis in a vast desert of deadly gas. I took down the American's machine, fearful in moving it that I might stop its working. Taking the mouthpiece between my lips I again entered Sir John's room, this time without feeling any ill effects.

My poor master was long beyond human help. There was evidently no one alive in the building except myself. Out in the street all was silent and dark. The gas was extinguished, but here and there in shops the incandescent lights was still weirdly burning, depending, as they did, on accumulators, and not on direct engine power.

I turned automatically towards Cannon Street Station, knowing my way to it even if blindfolded, stumbling over bodies prone on the pavement, and in crossing the street I ran against a motionless 'bus, spectral in the fog, with dead horses lying in front, and their reins dangling from the nerveless hand of a dead driver. The ghostlike passengers, equally silent, sat bolt upright or hung over the edge-boards in attitudes horribly grotesque.

VII.—The Train with its Trail of Dead.

If a man's reasoning faculties were alert at such a time (I confess mine were dormant), he would have known there could be no train at Cannon Street Station, for if there was not enough oxygen in the air to keep a man alive, or a gas-jet alight, there would certainly not be enough to enable an engine fire to burn, even if the engineer retained sufficient energy to attend to his task.

At times instinct is better than reason, and it proved so in this case. The railway in those days from Ealing came under the City in a deep tunnel. It would appear that in this underground passage the carbonic acid gas would first find a resting-place on account of its weight; but such was not the fact. I imagine that a current through the tunnel brought from the outlying districts a supply of comparatively pure air that, for some minutes after the general disaster, maintained human life.

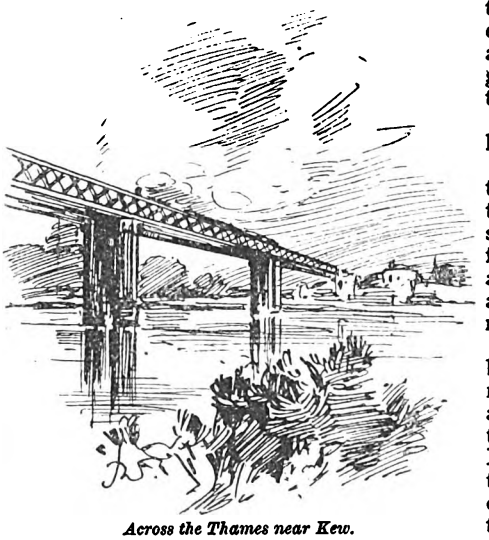
Be this as it may, the long platforms of Cannon Street underground station presented a fearful spectacle. A train stood at the down platform. The electric lights burned fitfully. This platform was crowded with men, who fought each other like demons, apparently for no reason, because the train was already packed as full as it could hold. Hundreds were dead under foot, and every now and then a blast of foul air came along the tunnel, whereupon hundreds more would relax their grips, and succumb.

Over their bodies the survivors fought, with continually thinning ranks. It seemed to me that most of those in the standing train were dead. Sometimes a desperate body of fighters climbed over those lying in heaps, and, throwing open a carriage door, hauled out passengers already in, and took their places, gasping. Those in the train offered no resistance, and lay motionless where they were flung, or rolled helplessly under the wheels of the train. I made my way along the wall as well as I could to the engine, wondering why the train did not go. The engineer lay on the floor of his cab, and the fires were out.

Custom is a curious thing. The struggling mob, fighting wildly for places in the carriages, were so accustomed to trains arriving and departing that it apparently occurred to none of them that the engineer was human and subject to the same atmospheric conditions as themselves. I placed the mouthpiece between the purple lips, and, holding my own breath, like a submerged man, succeeded in reviving him.

He said that if I gave him the machine he would take out the train as far as the steam already in the boiler would carry it. I refused to do this, but stepped on to the engine with him, saying it would keep life in both of us until we got out into better air. In a surly manner he agreed to this, but he did not play fair.

Each time he refused to give up the machine until I was in a fainting condition with holding in my breath; and, finally, he felled me to the floor of the cab. I imagine that the machine rolled off the train as I fell and that he jumped after it. The remarkable thing is, that neither of us needed the machine, for I remember that just after we started I noticed through the open iron door that the engine fire suddenly became aglow again, although at the time I was in too great a state of bewilderment and horror to understand what it meant.



Across the Thames near Kew.

A western gale had sprung up—an hour too late.

Even before we left Cannon Street those who still survived were comparatively safe, for one hundred and sixty-seven persons were rescued from that fearful heap of dead on the platforms, although many died within a day or two after, and others never recovered their reason.

When I regained my senses after the blow dealt by the engineer, I found myself alone, and the train speeding across the Thames near Kew. I tried to stop the engine, but did not succeed. However, in experimenting, I managed to turn on the air brake, which in some degree checked the train and lessened the impact when the crash came at Richmond terminus.

I sprang off on the platform before the engine reached the terminal buffers, and saw passing me, like a nightmare, the ghastly train-load of the dead. Most of the doors were swinging open, and every compartment was jammed full, although, as I afterwards learnt, at each curve of the permanent way, or extra lurch of the train, bodies had fallen out all along the line.

The smash at Richmond made no difference to the passengers. Besides myself, only two persons were taken alive from the train, and one of these—his clothes torn from his back in the struggle—was sent to an asylum, where he was never able to tell who he was; neither, as far as I know, did anyone ever claim him.

ISOBEL'S FASHIONS FOR CHILDREN.

No. 1. NOW ON SALE. Price 1½d.

This Paper is devoted to Children's Dress, and many Charming Fashions are given in each Number.

A free Paper Pattern with each Copy.

Digitized by Google

The Supreme Sacrifice

On the banks of the Orge, but a short distance from Belles-Fontaines, can be seen an elegant little château of modern construction, roofed with slate. Standing on the hill-side, in the midst of grassy lawns, and surrounded by low trees, the house attracts the attention of the few rowers who from time to time descend the Orgeto Juvisy. Occasionally a fisherman —in search of a good place to throw his hook—has perceived, on the heights above, a woman, her face covered with a thick veil, and a young man who walked slowly beside her, leaning on her arm. At the slightest sound of an oar, both disappeared round the bend of a path or behind a clump of shrubs. The people of Juvisy had vainly employed every effort to penetrate the mystery.

After having exhausted all imaginable suppositions, the innkeeper and the grocer of Juvisy had decided that the young man was a maniac, whom his family had imprisoned in that property, bounded by a high wall on the side towards the road, and by a river on that towards the fields. As for the woman, she was a relative, or a hireling, and when a painter, returning from Belles-Fontaines, asked who was the owner of that sheltered, mysterious-looking park, without the slightest hesitation they replied: "It is a madman who lives there."

. . . . . .

On July 10, 1884, during one of those periods of heat which Senegambia envies us, the Viscount de Montbrun left his small hotel in the Rue Varnet at nine in the morning, and walked down the Champs Elysées. M. de Montbrun was one of those Parisians who never leave Paris.

"The sea," said he, "was made for fishermen and sailors. It has its beauties, but it is agreeable only one hour each day. As soon as it begins to ebb, it uncovers a lot of pestilential mud, compared with which our great sewer is a bottle of cologne. As for the country, it is always just as hot there as in Paris, with this difference—you never know what to do with your evenings."

On all sides he saw carriages loaded with trunks. The preparations for the approaching 14th of July festivities saddened his heart, for the true Parisian is the inveterate enemy of public holidays and of all manifestations which disturb his repose.

"Where can I take refuge for three days?" thought M. de Montbrun. The year previous he had gone to St. Germain, and they had made just as much racket, and shot off quite as many bombs there as at Paris. Montbrun then remembered that he had promised himself an excursion into Brittany before the vandaliser had finished transforming that old corner of his country. To see again Vitré Fougères, pass a day at St. Malo, and then return, would be just the thing. He would thus avoid the crowd and noise.

On the morrow Montbrun arrived at Vitré. It was Saturday evening. In provincial towns, to fairly judge the collective beauty of their women, it is necessary to take one's post on Sunday at the door of a church. That is why Montbrun stood as early as eight in the morning before the splendid edifice dedicated to St. Martin, waiting for mass to be over.

Before leaving Paris he had thrown into a pillar-box a few words addressed to Mlle. Paula Salimberi, an artistic dancer at the Eden Theatre. Paula was a superb girl, a native of Southern Italy, with all the ardour of that clime beaming from her large, dark eyes. She had made her début at Naples, and, after a season at the Italian Theatre at Nice, had displayed to the Parisians her irreproachable dancing and varied graces.

Montbrun was then twenty-eight years of age, a handsome man, well versed in theatrical doings, whose personal charms were augmented by an income of sixty thousand francs a year. His admiration for the charming ballet-dancer was at once reciprocated, and they were soon launched upon the waves of a desperate flirtation. But the young man's fancy was short-lived. It was not long before the shallow attractions of the Italian beauty ceased to please him, and he longed to escape from her altogether.

But Othello's jealousy was puerile compared with hers. Montbrun was fairly afraid of her. He dared not tell her outright what the gradual decline of his attentions portended. He had simply dropped a note to her upon his departure for Vitré, bidding her a long farewell, and intimating that he might never see her again. As he believed that she had no means of procuring his address, he thought himself now well out of her way.

Mass was over, and people were beginning to come out of the church. Suddenly Montbrun was seized with admiration. Amid the crowd he had caught sight of the face of a young girl. Never in his most ardent dreams had he imagined aught so lovely as that face, with its ideal lines, its more than earthly beauty—beauty so calm, so serene, so radiantly pure that it seemed that of one of God's angels.

He wondered if it were possible that such a creature existed. He held his breath as he gazed on her descending the church steps, smiling at an older woman who accompanied her—her mother, doubtless. Instinctively, Montbrun followed them from afar, and saw them enter a small house of modest appearance. Taking the number, he returned to the hotel and asked for information.

"The beautiful girl? Mlle. de Larade! Her father was an excellent man; his family was rich before the Revolution, but each succeeding generation had sold off, little by little, lands and fields and woods to keep up their rank. Finally, poor M. de Larade had taken refuge in a small building formerly occupied by his servant. There he lived, as best he could, with his wife and his daughter Jeanne. He had probably not more than twelve or fifteen francs a day income; but the ladies knew how to live on very little, while he, poor gentleman, had even given up taking snuff."

The Viscount wrote to his lawyer at Paris, requesting him at once to send him a letter of introduction to a lawyer of Vitré, and to apprise that gentleman that he, Montbrun, came of a good family, had the reputation of being a man of honour, and was not without fortune. After which the lawyer of Vitré would effect his acquaintance with a family wherein he hoped to find happiness.

Everything happened as the Viscount had arranged. He was presented to Mlle. Jeanne de Larade, found her all he had thought, came again and again to her home, and was finally accepted as her future husband, upon certain conditions. Montbrun promised everything they wished. He was in an ecstasy of bliss during the few weeks which preceded the day fixed for his marriage.

In the midst of his dreaming he received, through his lawyer—he had carefully concealed his address from all others—a letter from one of his friends, who wrote him that Paula Salimberi was seeking him in every direction, and uttering direful threats.

At length the eventful day arrived. The contract had been signed. Two friends of Montbrun had come from Paris to serve him as witnesses, and on the 10th of September, at eleven in the morning, the guests left in carriages for the Mayor's office. The Viscount, and two or three persons, were speaking with a functionary at that office, when they were startled by a piercing scream, followed by a loud clamour of voices.

Digitized by Google

Rushing to the windows they saw a hurrying crowd, amid which a small group was massed about a recumbent form.

"What has happened?" exclaimed Montbrun, almost suffocated by dismay.

"An unknown woman has thrown vitriol in the face of Mlle. de Larade. All one side of the poor child's face is badly burnt, and an eye destroyed. They are carrying her to her home."

Montbrun fell, rigid and unconscious, to the floor.

He tried vainly during the day to be received at the home of his betrothed.

"Tell him that he will never see me again!" she cried, shedding tears that, rolling over her scarred cheeks, burnt her like fire.

The suffering of M. de Montbrun was intense; consumed with fever, his heart seemed pressed in a vice.

A little later a small package was delivered to him.

The unknown woman—arrested immediately after the perpetration of her crime—stated that her name was Paula Salimberi; her motive, vengeance.

Montbrun shut himself in his bedroom and opened his parcel, which contained a small quantity of white powder. Folding a handkerchief into a bandage, he measured out two spoonfuls of the powder and spread it on the bandage, which he then placed over his eyes, tying it in a firm knot at the back of his head.

Two hours after, he arrived at the home of M. de Larade, in a coupé, from which the lawyer of Vitré helped him to descend.

"Do not come in," said Madame de Larade, "it would kill Jeanne."

"Tell her that she may receive me now," replied M. de Montbrun; "we shall be married as soon as she is able to leave the house. For me, her image will remain eternally what it was—I am blind."

. . . . . .

M. and Mme. de Montbrun lead a retired life in their château at Juvisy. Jeanne adores the husband who for her renounced for ever the sight of sky and fields and flowers. As for the blind man, he has kept intact the picture of an ideal maiden smilingly descending the steps of the church of St. Martin. He is happy, for, in the unending night to which he has condemned himself, he sees her always young, always beautiful.

IT was a fine afternoon, towards the end of September.

In the quaint and narrow street of a little Spanish town, situated upon the shores of the Mediterranean, a crowd had gathered round a lottery office to stare at the list of winning numbers attached to the wall. Upon the outside of the crowd stood a woman dressed in rags, a lottery ticket in her hand. Unable to read herself, she was imploring others to help her.

"Has my number won?" she was crying. "Ah, poor Dios! Tell me, has my number won!"

But she could get no response. Her neighbours were too much absorbed in their own fortune or misfortune to attend to her.

While she was still reiterating her solitary question, there appeared at the bend of the street a graceful little lady, wearing a mantilla, arranged over a high comb. She had a very sweet face, upon which was stamped an expression of patient resignation. The lustre of her large, dark eyes was somewhat faded, and her dark hair was streaked with grey. But as she walked alone, more briskly than Spanish ladies usually do, much more briskly than the servant behind her liked, she smiled to herself as if under the influence of a pleasant dream, and used her fan with just enough coquetry to suggest that the dream related to an absent lover.

"Let me see your number," she said to the woman with the lottery ticket. She took the paper and compared it with the one on the wall. "No," she added presently, "I don't see your number."

"I have not lost again," cried the miserable speculator, "Say I have not lost again."

"I fear you have," said the lady gently. "But see, here is a 'real' for you."

Without waiting to hear the blessings which were invoked upon her, she walked swiftly away, murmuring, "My number has won, at any rate." And then she smiled.

As she passed by, the shopkeepers sitting within their doors cast after her sleepy glances in which could be detected an element of pity, if not of contempt.

"It is long enough she had waited for him," said an officer in artillery uniform, one of a group sitting outside a casino.

"Poor fool," said another. "He has seen many brighter eyes than hers."

"She thinks not."

"Miguel faithful!" exclaimed a third. "But it is wasting soap to lather a Moor's head!" Whereat they all laughed.

Everybody in the town knew the story of the Dona Dolores Morano de Cuesta, and no Spaniard could understand it. While a mere girl she had been betrothed to a young officer named Miguel Garciay Blanco, who had a fine long list of ancestors, but no money. For this reason the marriage had been deferred until he had gained a rank that would enable him to support a wife. He had for years been away from his native land on foreign service, and now, this afternoon, his vessel was expected home from Cuba. Judged by his letters, he still loved her; certainly she still loved him, or, rather, her remembrance of him. Their constancy puzzled all who knew them. It was only to be accounted for (so they said) by supposing that they were both a little weak in the head.

The town gate opened upon the quay. Underneath the wall lay the usual concourse of cripples, basking in the sunlight and imploring alms. Immediately in front a band was playing.

When Dolores arrived upon the scene, a troopship had just come alongside. Swarthy soldiers were pouring along the unprotected gangways, and forming in line upon the quay. Dolores, with heightened colour and quickened pace, pressed forward to join the crowd which had gathered, and eagerly scanned the face of each new arrival.

A tall, thin officer, wearing a commandant's uniform, stepped on shore, and, merely bestowing a careless, indolent smile upon the spectators, passed her so closely that she could almost touch him. She looked at his handsome, furrowed features, then her face brightened. She was trembling in every limb.

"Miguel!" she gasped, with a dart of the hand. He turned, pulled his moustache, and stared at her for several moments before he recognised her.

"What? Dolores? Is it you?" he said.

"Oh, Miguel, don't you know me?" she faltered.

"Yes, I know you now (he shook hands with her), but how changed you are. Your hair is grey." He was back in the bygone years, and had forgotten the change in himself.

Digitized by Google

"But my heart is unchanged," she said.

"Ah!" he replied carelessly, "how I have looked forward to this moment!"

"And now you are disappointed." She was almost crying.

"Disappointed! No. Why should you say so. But I must be going" (as a bugle reminded him of his duties). "Shall we meet to-morrow—at the old time and place?"

"To-morrow! Why not to-night? At Isabel's?"

"I fear I shall be too busy."

She looked at him in despair. "To-morrow, then," she replied, and raising his cap he went away.

Dolores remained where she was until the soldiers had marched away; then, tottering to a chair, sat down and hid her white face behind her fan.

Was it for this she had waited so patiently, through long and lonely years? "Your hair is grey," he had said to her. What did those cruel words mean? That those old days had gone, never to return? As she sat there in the sunlight her grief vanished away, and in its place there arose a fierce desire to be revenged. But now several of her friends had joined her, and although she chatted with them she found it so difficult (as most Spanish women do) to control her feelings, that, calling her maid, she soon started for home. On her way she met the woman with the lottery ticket, now in a state of great excitement.

"You were mistaken, beautiful lady," she cried. "My number has won, blessed be the Virgin!"

"Ah!" said Dolores; "it is I who have lost."

Dolores occupied the first floor of a house situated at the corner of the "Plaza," a fine open square with fountains in the centre. Once inside her room she allowed her feelings more freedom. Her maid, while engaged in changing her walking dress for a loose wrapper, was surprised to find her usually amiable mistress so petulant and out of sorts. When alone, Dolores vented her anger upon the inanimate objects around her, notably Miguel's portrait, which she threw to the ground and stamped upon. Having cooled her anger, she sat down to think out a scheme of revenge; as evening drew on, and the lamps were lighted, she was still elaborating her plans. Yet, when finished, they were very simple. She had decided to request the assistance of a cousin, a hot-headed duellist and an officer of the Marines. He was to provoke a quarrel with Miguel, call him out, and run him through the body. That was all.

Dolores began to write to her cousin, but was interrupted by the tinkling of a bell. She knew well what it signified, and seizing the lamp she hurried out to the balcony.

A procession was just leaving the monastery at the opposite corner of the "Plaza" beyond the fountains. It was headed by a boy with a bell; then came a white-hooded priest with something in his hands; then black-robed priests, who held a red umbrella over his head; and, lastly, a motley crowd from the streets around. It advanced swiftly towards Dolores, preceded by crowds of women who knelt to let it pass them, then running forward knelt again. At the ringing of the bell lamps appeared in all the balconies, and from all, as the priests glided silently and swiftly through the gloom, kneeling figures looked down upon them.

Dolores, kneeling in her balcony, prayed for the departing soul. But with this prayer was mingled another—that her revenge might soon be realised. It seemed as though a complete change had been wrought in this woman—hitherto so kind and gentle and patient in her long wait for her lover, now burning with revenge—that revenge being the death of her lover. Therefore, preoccupied as she was with her solitary idea, it was with unusual indifference that she watched the rapid approach of the priests bearing the Sacrament. She saw them pass under her balcony, and saw them turn into the street at the corner of which her home stood. Then her curiosity was slightly aroused.

"He lives in the end house, if he has gone back to his old quarters," she murmured, still kneeling. Her interest grew as the procession sped on. When was it going to stop? Now? Or now? No, it held on its way. But, oh! What was that, a cold thrill ran through her veins, it had stopped at his house. "Oh, Sainted Mother," she cried, "surely no harm has happened to him!"

Summoning her maid, she ran out into the street.

"Who is dying?" she demanded of the first person she met.

"The Commandant Miguel," was the reply.

Forgetful of appearances, of her revenge, of everything, she rushed back for her mantilla.

"It can't be," she gasped. Her maid tried to soothe her, but all to no purpose. She was determined to see him, and for this purpose again went out, passing the procession on its way back to the monastery; she sped on to his house. Arrived at the door she stopped and rang. The servant who appeared said with fear, "Ah; child of my heart, you are too late. But blessed be the Virgin, he received the Sacrament before he died."

Unmindful of her words, Dolores pushed past the excited domestic, who had thus addressed her, and entered the house. She knew the situation of Miguel's rooms, by the windows, although she had never been inside the house before. So with noiseless steps she ran up the stairs to the first floor. The door of the bedroom stood ajar, a lamp was burning on a small table by the side of the bed on which he lay.

So she could see his stiff, cold features only too plainly. Yet she would not believe that he was dead. She flung herself upon the bed, and, passionately kissing his cold lips, implored him to speak to her. Oh, why would he not answer her? Why was he so silent? Did he know what she had been doing when the bell summoned her to the window?

So passed many a weary hour, until at last they moved her gently away, and she suffered herself to be taken home, where she remained, listless, dazed, and motionless.

"He is not dead! he cannot be dead!" was her one cry.

But the next morning, when the usual black-edged card announced the time of the funeral, her passionate energy broke out afresh. Clinging to her solitary idea, she visited Miguel's colonel in order to request him to defer the funeral. This request was denied, but, thinking to pacify her, the colonel agreed to have him buried in the catacombs and a sentry put there to guard the tomb. Solaced with this promise, she went home.

The funeral was a very grand one, the procession long; but it was over at last, and the single sentry left at his post at the gate of the catacombs.

The sentry, a young Spaniard, full of Spanish superstition, did not at all relish his new duty. Shortly before dawn, while the valleys were still plunged in gloom, and only the higher peaks had as yet caught the glow of the advancing sun, a startling thing happened. A tall figure, wrapped in grave-clothes, came rushing through the cemetery, with its white drapery flowing behind. It made straight for the gate where stood the trembling sentry.

Here was the ghost he had been dreading. There was no time to turn, no time to consider, and lifting his rifle, he fired, almost at random, and fled. He heard a wild, unearthly cry, which seemed to freeze his blood; he heard it again, echoing among the mountains, but nothing else. On, on he flew, but presently, finding he was not pursued, stopped on a slight hill, and thence looked back upon the white, motionless figure, upon a coach, which was being driven at full speed along the road. Seeing that it stopped at the cemetery gate he hastened down to meet it.

"Where is he? Where is he? He was alive when I left home, I know he was!" cried a woman's voice.

"Señora, a white thing came tearing across the grass; I fired; it lies at the gates."

Dolores sprang out of the coach, and was beside the "white thing" in an instant. "You have killed him!" she exclaimed, and fell back.

"You brute!" cried her maid. "You have killed her, too!"

It was quite true. The terrible awakening had come to her lover, just as Dolores had thought, and now she had followed him to the Land of Shadows.

Digitized by Google

THE TENTH OF JUNE.

By John K. Leys, Author of "In the Toils," "My Hindoo Friend," &c., &c.

Illustrated by Raymond Potter.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The End of the Vendetta.

"Backwater!" cried Geoffrey.

It is doubtful whether the three Frenchmen understood the word, but they understood well enough what was meant, for they protested loudly that the boat would be dashed in pieces—she was already overladen—she would be swamped if they took another man on board.

But Geoffrey, taking the fourth oar, held it out to the sinking man. He had just strength enough to grasp it, and Geoffrey towed him up to the gunwale of the boat.

"Pull ahead now!" he cried; and a few minutes later he and the General managed to haul the Rajah on board.

He lay like one dead in the bottom of the boat. It was impossible, cramped as they were for room, to examine his wound, or do anything beyond trying to make him conscious.

At length he opened his eyes, and said, when Leila asked him, that he was not suffering much pain. All they could do for him was to shelter him as much as possible from the rain and the spray that washed over them; and Leila made her feet a pillow for his head.

No one but Leila, indeed, had much time to think of him after he was pulled out of the sea. The question was whether they would be able to make the land. Every now and then, as the tiny craft rolled in the trough of the sea, it seemed as if she must be swamped outright. It seemed impossible to make headway against the wind.

Ernest Fresual, indeed, thought they should abandon the attempt to land that night, and let the wind carry them out to sea, where they might be picked up next day; and, the Englishmen, not being sailors, were inclined to agree with him. Jacques Fresnal, however, pulled away at his oar without vouchsafing a reply.

"Suppose the wind falls, we might keep afloat till we are picked up," he said at length. "But suppose it rises, what then? We should be swamped; that's all. Bah!"

"I think we are getting a little further in," said Geoffrey, after a long look at the horizon. "I don't think the waves are quite so high. We must be getting under the lee of the land, for I am sure the wind is stronger than ever."

Geoffrey towed him up to the gunwale of the boat.

They landed without much difficulty.

Fresual nodded assent.

"It is stronger," he said. "If we were now where we were an hour ago, we should be in the water."

There were no lights to guide them but the street lamps of the town, and these still seemed a long way off, when a loud sound like an explosion, followed by a strange rumbling noise fell on their ears.

"What can that be?" each one said, and looked at his neighbour. Even those who were rowing, stopped, and bent their heads to listen. But the noise was not repeated.

The Rajah had heard it, and had grasped the side of the boat with one hand, and pulled himself up till he was able to look out on the horizon. There was nothing but black darkness to be seen; but there was in his great eyes a look of intelligence and satisfaction.

Leila noticed it, and when she had helped him to lie down again in the bottom of the boat, she whispered to him,

"What was that dreadful noise?"

"The steamer is blown up," he said composedly.

"What!—You do not mean——?"

"Do you not remember? You made me promise to kill you, rather than that the Hindoos should keep you. There was only one way to do that and to avenge your death at the same time. I fastened down the safety-valve of the engine. Now the boiler has burst, and as she is helpless she must either go to the bottom, or those on board of her will be taken. They cannot escape."

The girl shuddered, but she said no more.

Digitized by Google

The dawn was breaking when the boat, laden to the gunwale, drew slowly near to the beach. It was now blowing harder than ever, but near shore the water was comparatively smooth, and they landed without much difficulty.

While the General and Geoffrey were conveying Leila and the Rajah to Madame Fresual's, Linton thought of Captain Byngham, and ran off to the Villa Carnot. But the house was empty, and the two lamps that had been placed in the upper window had been extinguished. It was easy to guess what had happened. Byngham had managed to slip off his gag, and had called out; or one of the sailors, perhaps, in search of more brandy, had gone into the sitting-room and found him. Then they had released him, and they had all gone off together.

When the light grew stronger, the false Aphrodite was visible, a big black dot against the northern horizon. The explosion had rendered her helpless, though it had not sent her to the bottom, as the Rajah had imagined it would do.

She was still riding at anchor, when she was boarded some hours' later by a French revenue cutter, and not a soul was on board. The Hindoos, rather than be taken, had gone off in another small boat, and as they never were heard of again, there could not be a doubt that their boat had been swamped, and all on board of her lost.

A big black dot against the northern horizon.

As for Captain Byngham, he had disappeared entirely, and for some time the General and his friends were much puzzled to know what had become of him. After a time, however, it transpired that a small pleasure boat, which had been lying on the beach that night, not far from the Villa Carnot, was missing; and it seemed tolerably certain that Captain Byngham, and the four seamen, had gone off in her with the intention of reaching the steamer.

If they did reach her they must have left her again after the explosion, along with the Hindoos; but it seemed more likely that they had not come up to the steamer before the explosion, and had missed her in the darkness, there being no one on board to signal to them, and so had been blown out to sea and lost.

The story of the Tenth of June is now told

The Rajah's wound was not a mortal one. He recovered; and as the General insisted on taking him to Seacombe Towers, as soon as he could be moved there, to be nursed into convalescence, it was only natural that Jane Stoddart should be asked to take a share in the good work. The consequence was that five months later the eldest Miss Stoddart became the Ranee of Nagore.

Geoffrey's wooing prospered wonderfully after that memorable Tenth of June. Indeed the General himself said to him the very next morning:

"You remember a conversation you and I had in London just before we started for America? Well, after what has happened I wish you to forget what I said then. In short, I like you, Geoffrey; I owe my life to you; and if you can make the running with Leila, I won't play the part of the stern father. If Leila chooses elsewhere she can tell you herself; but as far as I am concerned I wish you success."

Geoffrey took the General at his word; and that same evening Leila laid her little hand in his and promised to be his wife.

Among the various wedding presents that were given and received on the occasion of the double wedding, was one which attracted great attention. This was the curious black opal which had been taken from the Temple at Churruckpore.

It was presented to the Rajah by the General; but the Ranee does not count it among her treasures. Amavati knew it from Chunder Sen's description to be the mysterious gem which the Brahmins revered as a relic of the last avatar, or incarnation, of Vishnu. He knew that in their eyes it was of priceless value, and he offered it to the priests of his old faith as a farewell gift. No white man's eye will ever behold it again.

THE END.

AT THE PRESENT MOMENT

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

CONTAINS

Special Articles of Interest to Cyclists, Soldiers, Cricketers, Stamp-Collectors, and Smokers, and also insures you for £2,000.

Digitized by Google

THE BROTHERS LORKE.

THE Hon. Richard Plantagenet Lorke differed from most Englishmen of distinction in that his breeding was as unimpeachable as his physical comeliness was striking. In conversation his tones were not self-assertive and blatant, but, on the contrary, as soft and winning as a woman's. He never bragged of his nation's achievements, nor sneered covertly at the manners and customs of the hospitable American friends that entertained him so handsomely. He did not make a practice of expressing his contempt for American society by going to dinner parties in tweed clothes, and had no fondness for indulging in heavy drinking, and then criticising the quality of his host's liquor.

He was civil to all men, and gracefully polite to all women—particularly the old ones. Moreover, he had not yet been known to play cards for high stakes or borrow money from the members of the clubs at which he had been put up. He had even been known to recognise the point of a joke, and—most marvellous of all!—occasionally crack a very fair one himself.

All this was very extraordinary to the critical American society, though, of course, no one was so impolite as to comment upon it openly. It was little Freddy Dinkelspiel, the rich jeweller's grandson, that would have obliged any foreign nobleman on earth with a loan of ten thousand, and thanked the fates for the opportunity of doing it, that confided, awe-stricken and sotto voce, to one of his cronies: "Of course, I like Lorke as well as any of you, but, hang me, if he doesn't seem too much of the gentleman to be the son of an Earl."

This was some six weeks after the superb figure and golden Grecian head of the Hon. Richard Plantagenet Lorke had first appeared to dazzle the youthful and gilded set of the Whipper-Snapper Club. There was a freshness about his smile, and a sunniness in the straightforward gaze of his bright, blue eyes that won him a welcome at once. Further than that, the man that had introduced him, young Caspar Van Dunk, the heir to untold millions, and the very embodiment of all that was exclusive and patrician in New York life, was not a man to be slighted. Van's word was law in such matters, and his assurance that the Englishman's credentials were unimpeachable was more than sufficient.

The newcomer's magnetic personality did the rest. Van Dunk and Lorke were quite inseparable. They walked, drove, dined, and went to the theatre together. They had made each other's acquaintance on the steamer one very stormy day, on which the latter had saved the former's sister a very ugly fall by catching her in his arms at the very instant that a plunge of the vessel had overturned the steamer chair upon which she was reclining while very, very ill.

Truth to tell, the young Briton had never quite forgotten that instant either. Edith was one of those exasperatingly bewitching creatures with the physique of a well-developed woman and the face of a child; and her pathetic glance of gratitude, as the pallor of her cheeks blossomed for an instant into a delicious rosy tint, had made him think momentarily of heaven and the angels.

After that there had been a few stolen moments on deck, when the shy pleasure in the girl's face as he approached her had set his stout British heart beating like a sledge-hammer; and he had, of course, seen her quite often at her own house, where he was a welcome and favoured guest.

But yesterday, only yesterday, when they were cantering in the Park together, with the groom a safe distance behind, she must have grown alarmed at the words he was finding himself sufficiently audacious to utter; for she told him with much stammering and blushing, of her engagement to Mr. Skinnand Fleece, a very prosperous lawyer who was expected home from Europe that very day. And the Hon. Richard Plantagenet Lorke, as they walked their horses homeward, was sufficient of a brute and beast to experience joy in the knowledge that his dainty companion's lip was all a-quiver, and her tender grey eyes melting with moisture suspiciously akin to tears.

In consequence of all of which, the Englishman, second son of an earl though he was, was not in an exactly happy frame of mind as he walked up Fifth Avenue this bright autumn afternoon on his way to his apartments. He was to dine at the Van Dunks', and would meet, among others, Mr. Skinnand Fleece. The thought brought a steely look into the sunny, blue eyes, but it departed instantly, and he found his brain shaping a wish that the girl this infernal lawyer was to rob him of might be as happy as a queen all the days of her life.

. . . . . .

The dinner was, of course, a masterpiece. Banker Van Dunk's dinners always were masterpieces. Lorke, by the way, had quite won his heart by praising them. There were some of Caspar's intimates from the club, a sprinkling of girls and dowagers, and one or two of the host's fellow magnates from Wall Street. The happy Mr. Fleece did not appear—he was expected later—and Lorke was supremely happy during the hour and a half that the beautiful Edith sat beside him.

While the people were chatting in twos and threes in the drawing-room, Lorke and Edith found their way, quite accidentally, of course, into a recess curtained off by half-drawn portières, and in which stood some great vases of ferns and palms. Someone was playing a noisy waltz on the gilt-covered Steinway, and the music quite drowned the half-whispered tones in which they spoke. Lorke's brain was on fire. He had not uttered a dozen words before he broke off short with: "I love you, dear."

The girl's head dropped. "Hush!" she whispered, breathlessly. But they were unobserved, and Lorke, after one swift look round, bent his head and kissed her on the lips.

At the instant he did so there was a commotion in the room, and everyone was welcoming Mr. Skinnand Fleece, who had just entered. As for Edith, she had turned very pale, and seemed about to faint. She managed to control herself, but leaned heavily upon Lorke's arm as they advanced to meet the new-comer.

The glance of Mr. Fleece, who was a very tall man, of perhaps, thirty-five, with a very white complexion and coal-black hair and beard, was not altogether pleasant as it rested on the couple. But suddenly the expression of his white face changed totally. He bestowed on Lorke, for an instant, a cold stare of stony contempt, and as he drew Edith's arm with an exasperating air of proprietorship within his own, he said to her icily: "I am sorry to find you in such company."

The Englishman's lips turned white, and he moved a step forward. Everyone in the room heard the remark. There was a dead silence, which was broken by Lorke:

"I have not the honour of knowing you, sir," he said simply, "but perhaps you will be good enough to explain your meaning."

"Bluffing won't go," rejoined Fleece coarsely. "Of course you don't remember me, eh?"

"I do not, sir."

"Then let me tell you," answered the lawyer, with great heat, "that I remember you—yes, very well indeed—as the accomplished gentleman that swindled me out of £400 at Algiers three months ago by palming the ace of spades in a game of Nap. Do I make myself understood?"

The look of blank amazement that came over Lorke's face gave way swiftly to one of fury. The veins in his forehead swelled. He clenched his fists and seemed ready to spring at the throat of the man that had made this fearful accusation.

"You speak falsely, sir," he said quietly.

Meanwhile horrified murmurs of amazement broke from the other guests. Before anyone could speak, Van Dunk, senior marched forward and said: "Fleece, this gentleman is my friend and my guest. You might have chosen a more fitting time for your denunciation; but since you have delivered it, I suppose you are prepared to prove what you have said."

Digitized by Google

"Prove it? Of course, I am," sneered the lawyer. Edith's white lips parted in a pathetic gasp, and the tears came into her eyes. "See! Previous to swindling me, this gentleman had presented me with his photograph. I have kept it as a pleasant souvenir of my visit to Algiers, and by the best luck in the world I happen to have it with me. Examine it, sir," handing Lorke the portrait he had wrenched from his pocket; "examine it closely, and then try and summon up the nerve to deny your own identity."

Mechanically the Englishman extended his hand and took the picture. He looked at it, and his face faded to the colour of ashes. The piece of cardboard fell from his hand, and was picked up by Fleece, who proceeded to show it to the wondering guests. The likeness was perfect—blonde hair, kindly eyes, everything.

Lorke was gazing blankly in front of him. He swayed gently to and fro as though about to faint. Young Van Dunk stepped forward and looked into his face. "Lorke," he cried, in grief-stricken tones, "say something, old man; for pity's sake say the thing isn't true!"

For an instant the Englishman returned his gaze, frankly, openly. Then, as his eyes met the agonised ones of Edith, he bowed his head and said huskily: "I have nothing to say."

A whisper of astonishment and indignation ran through the room. Fleece smiled triumphantly and replaced the photograph in his coat pocket. Then the voice of Van Dunk, senior, was heard, saying to a servant: "Jackson, a cab for Mr. Lorke."

One look the condemned man cast upon the white-faced girl that stood beside his accuser with a piteous expression of intreaty in her grey eyes. Then, without glancing to the right or the left, he strode from the room. As he did so it seemed to his dulled senses as though he heard the girl whisper to the lawyer: "I hate you."

. . . . . .

A month of healthy exposure and hardship in the Rocky Mountain hunting country exercised quite an improvement in Lorke's appearance. When he went away he had looked like a consumptive in his last stages; when he returned there was a bronze glow on his smooth cheeks, and something like the old sparkle in his eyes.

Still, he was far from happy as he walked up Fifth Avenue on his way to the Holland House, where he was to stay for the three or four days before he sailed for England. Occasionally his features contracted; his teeth clenched themselves hard as he passed one of his former friends, who, on seeing him, would pass straight by with a stony and altogether unrecognising stare.

Presently the Englishman's heart almost stood still. Coming towards him was Caspar Van Dunk. He nerved himself for the "unkindest cut of all."

But, to his amazement, Caspar stopped short and stood gazing at him with an intensely puzzled expression.

It was Caspar that spoke first. "Why, Lorke," he said, stupidly enough, "but it is not really you, is it?"

"No one else, my—er—fair-weather friend," returned the Englishman coldly.

"But it can't be—no—how did you? Pshaw! I'm hanged if I can read the riddle," stammered the other.

"What riddle?"

"I simply mean to say that only yesterday, you, or a man claiming to be you, and the exact counterpart of what you were when you left, but without the sunburn I see on your face, called on me at the club and asked me for £20. Of course, I gave it him. He was half-drunk, and—well, very shabby, don't you know."

Again Lorke grew white. "I suppose you are convinced it was not I?" he asked.

"Of course, I am," exclaimed Van Dunk, and added, holding out his hand impulsively, "Lorke, I never believed that thing. Won't you explain now?"

"I can't," answered Lorke, and then burst out passionately, "but this last is pretty nearly too much."

"Walk up to the house with me," said Caspar quietly, "and have a chat."

"No," answered Lorke.

"Yes," insisted the other; "besides, Edith will like to see you."

This was enough. As they walked on up the Avenue conversing amiably on unimportant topics, Lorke noticed that the men they passed now looked surprised, it is true, but they bowed just the same. Then it was he felt he loved this patrician American youth like a brother.

At the moment Caspar was inserting his latchkey, the door opened, and a young man came staggering out on the steps. He was the exact and perfect physical counterpart of the Hon. Richard Plantagenet Lorke, save for the absence of the latter's brand-new bronze complexion. Caspar exclaimed: "This is the fellow, Lorke."

The man started back with a maudlin exclamation of horror. As for Lorke, his eyes were blazing. He grasped him by the collar and pushed him back inside the door without a word. Caspar followed, wondering.

"Now, sir," said the Englishman, "I have borne everything thus far, and I have suffered endless tortures for you, but you shall tell me—quickly, too—what you have been doing in this house, or I'll choke your life out."

As the fellow stood swaying backwards and forwards a light footstep was heard, and Edith Van Dunk stepped into the hall. There were traces of tears in her eyes. When she saw Lorke, the light of a great, astonished joy leapt into them. Before she could speak, her brother asked gently, "Edith, what does this fellow's presence here mean?"

"He came about an hour ago," she said blushing. "I saw him from the window, and let him in myself, because——"

"Well?"

"Because I thought it was Mr. Lorke," she said defiantly. Then she broke down and began to cry.

"The mistake was a natural one," said Lorke calmly. "In one respect the resemblance is perfect; but what did he do?"

"He asked me to lend him a hundred pounds, and I let him have it, because——"

Lorke smiled grimly.

"Because you thought it was I? I seem to be an expensive luxury."

"Brother!" whined the drunken man appealingly. Whereat Caspar and his sister started.

"I would not have told it if you hadn't," said Lorke. "Yes, my dear Caspar, this is my sweet, scapegrace brother, whom I promised our mother to care for and protect. I think I've done my duty. It is he that has 'given himself away,' as you Americans would say."

"Then," exploded Edith, "it was he that—that——"

"Precisely," answered Lorke. "Percy, my boy," he added, "you'd better go away from here. Come and see me at the Holland to-night. I'll pay your way home."

. . . . . .

"It was my fault, after all," said Lorke to Edith, during a tête-à-tête half an hour afterwards. "You see, I wrote and told him all about my New York visit and Fleece's charge, and begged him to write to your brother and exonerate me. It seems he has used the information I gave him in quite another manner."

"I've a confession to make," whispered Edith.

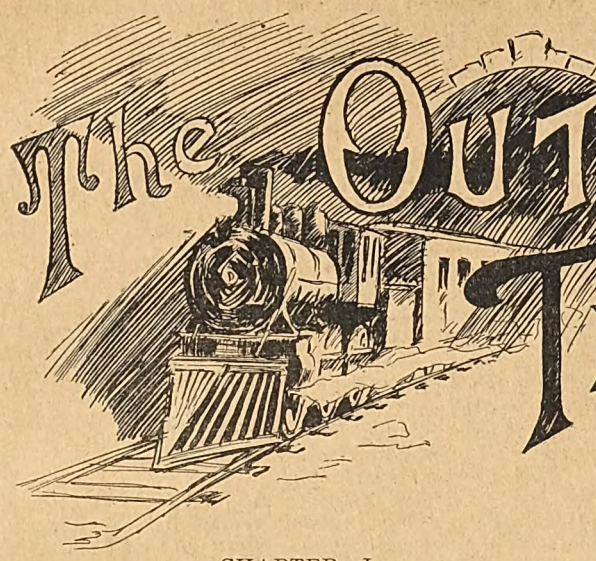
"And it is——?"

"When I thought he was you—and he looked so broken down and miserable—and it seemed so pitiful that you—you" (she blushed divinely) "should be reduced to begging me for a hundred pounds—I think I'd have given him a thousand if he'd asked for it—that—that—you see I thought it was you—that I—I kissed him."

"But what has become of Fleece?" asked Lorke wonderingly.

"I have not spoken to Mr. Fleece," was the answer, delivered in a whisper, "since the last night you were here."

Digitized by Google



The Outlaws' Treasure.

Illustrated by MR. A. KEMP TEBBY.

—o—

CHAPTER I.

WAITING FOR THE TRAIN.

HALF-PAST nine in the evening, and still no tidings of the express, which was due at La Grange over an hour ago.

The twenty odd passengers who were impatiently looking for its coming were pacing back and forth, stamping their feet—for it was a cool night in autumn—some smoking, all grumbling, and most of them denouncing the railway authorities who had allowed this dereliction of duty to occur on this particular night of all others.

The telegraph office, where a young man continually bent over his clicking machine, was constantly besieged by the fretful passengers, who kept thrusting their heads in at the small door or window, and inquiring whether there were any tidings of the expected train.

The clerk was an exception to the rule, and was polite and communicative. He kept his patience, and answered every question pleasantly, although some of them were of a trying or ludicrous character.

"She left Brampton on time," he answered, "over an hour ago, and came into Cornwall three minutes ahead."

"And did she leave Cornwall on time?"

"To a second; but since then we haven't heard a word of her."

Brampton was twenty miles distant. The express had thundered along for five miles until it had reached Cornwall, where it left on time, and it was now somewhere along the fifteen miles of road between Cornwall and La Grange, and had been there for an hour and a half without any tidings.

Something was wrong. Had the boiler exploded? Had High Bridge, over Devil's Creek, given way with the train upon it? Or had the more harmless accident of a heated "journal" or a mere breakdown rendered the mighty iron horse powerless?

"Why don't you telegraph to Cornwall?" inquired a small man with an immense carpet bag.

"So I have," was the reply.

The corpulent gentleman gave a low whistle.

"And what did they tell you?" was his next question.

"Nothing; for they knew nothing."

"That's queer; what was the reason?"

"The accident or whatever it may be that detains the train, has taken place between here and Cornwall. It may be nearer us than there, and in that case it would be natural that they should apply to us for information instead of we to them."

"As there are only fifteen miles between us and the other station," remarked a large, corpulent man, "the train, wherever it is, must be within eight miles of one of us, and I don't understand how it is that word hasn't reached us."

"Nor I either," replied the clerk significantly. The two men looked in each other's faces for a moment, and then the man that controlled the telegraph motioned to the other to come in and take a seat beside him.

"You seem to be about the most sensible man here," he said with a smile, "and I'll tell you something which no one knows excepting myself and the ticket collector, Brooks, who is too stupid to comprehend what it means." The stout individual stared curiously at him, as if he did not himself comprehend what it all meant.

"The express left Cornwall exactly at eight o'clock," said the young man, speaking in a guarded voice, so as not to be overheard by those who were constantly passing and stopping at the window, "and ought to have made the fifteen miles in about twenty minutes, but here it is over an hour late, and no tidings of it."

"But I know all that before," said the corpulent gentleman, after a moment's pause, thinking there was nothing more to come.

"But I haven't told you that five minutes after the express left Cornwall the wires were cut between here and there."

The corpulent gentleman gave a low whistle, and looked sharply at his informant, whose face lit up with a strange smile.

"Maybe the engine smashed down the telegraph poles, and broke the connection in that way."

"Not much," replied the operator, who occasionally indulged in slang. "It wouldn't have taken ten minutes for them to have restored the connection. No, it is something more serious than that."

"Explain yourself."

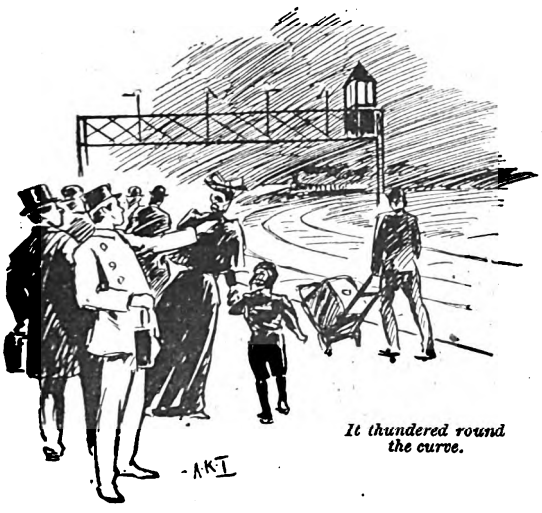
"I may as well out with it; I believe the wires have been cut and the express stopped by the Mulligan brothers."

"What! the mail robbers?"

"Yes."

In place of the serial story, entitled "Sindbad's Valley," by Mr. F. Leslie, which we announced in our last issue would commence this week, we have pleasure in giving the opening instalment of "The Outlaws' Treasure," the first few chapters of which appeared some little time back in a publication from this office. We have received many requests to publish this exciting story in its entirety, and take this opportunity of so doing. "The Outlaws' Treasure" will appear in weekly instalments, and will be profusely illustrated throughout by Mr. A. Kemp Tebby. On its completion we shall hope to publish Mr. Leslie's story in these columns.

Digitized by Google



It thundered round the curve.

"By Jingo!" exclaimed the passenger, with another whistle. "I shouldn't wonder if you're right. I am from Chicago, and I didn't know that this is the part of the country where those gentry work. But how is it the train is kept so long? I understood such things were done in quick time."

"So they are: it hasn't taken them fifteen minutes to go through the train, and get all the booty they wanted."

"Then what does it mean?"

"They have thrown it off the rails, and cut the wires in several places. The train I think will be here shortly."

"Do you allow such things in this part of the country?"

"How are we going to help it?"

"Why don't you have them arrested, tried, sent to prison, hanged or shot, or something else?"

"It is very easy for you to talk," said the clerk, warming up, "but it is another thing to act. Let a man testify against these villains, or let him be suspected of wishing to testify, and his life isn't worth a pin. There isn't a judge that dare sentence one of the gang, nor can a jury be found to convict them. So what would you do under the circumstances?"

"Organise a Vigilance Committee, and root them out, hunt them with dogs, and never stop hunting until they were extirpated from the face of the earth."

Young Brown stroked his beardless chin, and laughed in his quiet way, but said nothing.

"How many brothers are there?" inquired his companion.

"Two: Jim and Dick."

"And are these two sufficient to lord it over all of you?"

"They are the leaders. There are a half-dozen associated with them, and a more desperate set of villains never went unhung. It would be no easy matter to capture six or eight of them, as you can well imagine."

"Of course, it would be no child's play; but I presume it will have to come to that. They will keep on, I suppose, until the people will have to rise in self-defence. Do you know these men?"

"I know them as well as I do you, or better, as I never saw you before."

"You may call me Smith. What sort of looking men are they?"

"Dick is tall, slim, with hair as long and black as an Indian's, with a sandy complexion and heavy red whiskers."

"Yes," commented Smith, in an indifferent manner, strangely at variance with the excitement he had shown a few minutes before. "Do they live anywhere near here?"

"Last summer they lived about a mile up the road, with their mother; but since her death they haven't had any regular place of residence, and I suppose spend their leisure time in the woods."

"Do you know where their hiding-place is?"

"It isn't far from here. Between La Grange and Cornwall is a tract of wood, about ten miles broad, and fully twenty miles long. It is cut up with creeks, streams, and ravines, and a good deal of it is swamp. Here these fellows have their hiding-place, and it would take a smart set of men to hunt them out and effect their capture."

"Then I presume the train has to cross this trac timber?"

"Yes; about ten miles of the fifteen between us and the other station is taken up with the forest. Were it not night you could see the edge of the woods from the platform out there."

"Have they ever attacked the train before?"

"Twice; last summer they robbed the safe of the Adams' Express Company, and a couple of months ago attempted it again, but failed, and Dick Mulligan came very nigh getting his head blown off."

"How was it that they failed?"

"They put some rails upon the line, but instead of throwing the engine off, they were knocked aside. Dick Mulligan and one of his men were in the train, and got into the forward van, where Jim Wilkins was lying on top of the safe, and attempted to bind and gag him, but the plucky little fellow bombarded them so well with his revolver that they were glad enough to jump out of the van and run."

"And all this has happened," continued the burly Smith, with a palpable sneer upon his face, "and it has been known that it was likely to happen again every day, and yet you have invited the outrage by leaving yourselves defenceless."

"Whom do you mean by you?" inquired Brown, with a smile.

"The railway and the Express Company, and everybody who lives in the neighbourhood, and among the latter I reckon you, of course."

"Well, perhaps I am not altogether guiltless, but still allowances must be made. I never suspected that I was the man to lead in the formation of a Vigilance Committee, but I am ready to lend a hand at any time."

"Is there are reward offered for the capture of the Mulligan brothers?"

"There is a standing reward of £2,000 for the arrest and conviction of the whole gang, or £200 a-piece for every one who may be secured and punished."

"Enough to incite some of you ambitious young men to action. That would make a good marriage settlement for a young gentleman like you."

"Yes, it is quite an inducement. I hope it may induce some outside parties to engage in it."

The two men smiled, and looked at each other's faces.

"You may not be so far——hello!"

At that instance a sharp whoop was heard, and the telegraph clerk exclaimed:

"There comes the train."

A moment later the red glow of the headlight was seen as it thundered round the curve.

The corpulent Smith rushed out upon the platform with the other passengers, leaving Brown, the telegraph clerk, all unsuspicious of the fact that he had been tête-à-tête with one of the most skilful detectives in the United States, and a man whose business was specially to look after these same Mulligan brothers and their gang.

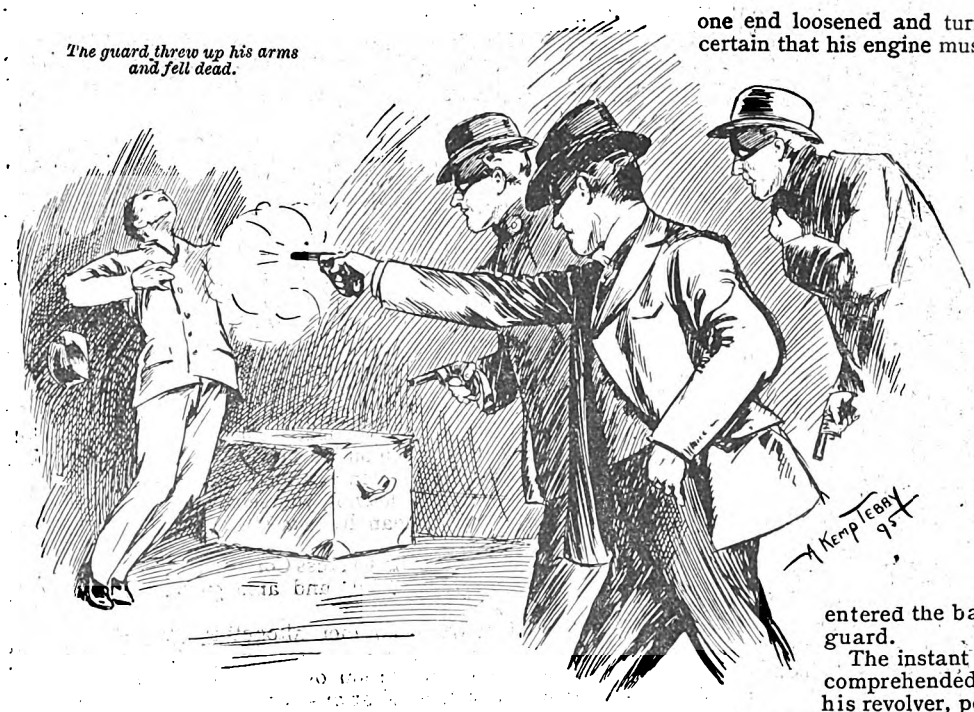
Stood with his hand upon the throttle.

CHAPTER II.

THE ROBBERY.

ON that cool autumn night the express steamed out of Cornwall, and as soon as it was fairly beyond the village rapidly increased its speed. It had twenty minutes to do the fifteen miles in, and as the immense driving-wheels spun faster and faster, and the ponderous piston-rods went and came, with their smooth, easy, and momentarily increasing motion, the engine-driver was confident of going into the La Grange station not a second behind time.

Digitized by Google



The guard threw up his arms and fell dead.

As is usual in America the train was made up of Pullman cars. There were three passenger-cars, besides the baggage and express car, and in the three former were not over thirty passengers, all told. In the forward part of the baggage-car was the huge safe belonging to the Adams' Express Company, under the guardianship of a drowsy-looking individual, who was smoking a pipe.

Near him was the guard, having in charge the United States mails—a wide-awake, nervous-looking individual, who, having just been appointed to his situation, had a large sense of its responsibilities and his own importance. The baggage-master was in the same compartment, quietly smoking a cigar, and fully as wide-awake as his companions.

Wilkins, the regular agent in charge of the valuable safe, lay dangerously ill at his home, fifty miles distant, and his deputy had been acting in his place for three days.

For a short time succeeding the robbery mentioned by Brown, an extra guard had accompanied the express; but as this involved an extra expense it was discontinued after a lapse of a few weeks, and matters were progressing in the same quiet manner as usual.

One mile out from Cornwall, and the train was tearing forward at a speed of about fifty miles an hour.

Five miles were passed in this manner, when the driver began slacking up, as his train approached High Bridge, leading over a deep, swampy stream, known as the "Devil's Creek." At the same time, his whistle sounded long and loud, its echoes reverberating for a great distance through the forest arches, as a warning to any daring pedestrians who might be meditating an attempt to cross the bridge.

The speed was considerably slackened, and the train rumbled over the bridge, the engine giving a sharp jerk forward, before it was fairly clear, and rapidly regained its terrific speed. There were woods upon every hand, while not a house was to be seen for miles.

Another mile was passed, and they were six from La Grange. The engine-driver again drew up as he neared a sharp curve, and stood with his hand upon the throttle, ready to let on or shut off the steam, as he should discover the lines clear or not.

Another second and the whistle gave two sharp screeches, twice repeated, and the wheels spun backward with lightning-like velocity, grinding and grasping until a stream of fire flew from beneath them.

What was the cause of this alarming signal?

Only a few hundred yards ahead he saw a rail displaced—one end loosened and turned aside just enough to make it certain that his engine must run off the line. Everything was done to check the speed, but no power in nature could check the fearful momentum of the train.

All that could be done was to slow the speed, and this was done so effectually that when the dangerous point was reached the engine was going less than ten miles an hour.

As was expected, the wheels ran off, ground their way down in the gravel, and then bounded over the ties and rails for a few yards, severely jolting the engine, and dragging the tender and front car after it, but doing them no serious injury. Suddenly the train halted, with the wheels of the locomotive less than a foot from the track.

At the very instant the whistle of the engine sounded, three men, their faces covered with masks, which had been placed on after passing out of the front car, entered the baggage-car, and made for the mail guard.

The instant the latter caught sight of them, he comprehended what it meant, and jerking out his revolver, pointed it at the foremost:

"Come a step nearer, and you're a dead man."

The words were scarcely out of his mouth when the sharp crack of a pistol broke upon the rumble and jumble of the train, and the guard threw up his arms and fell dead, pierced through the heart by the bullet of one of the mail robbers.

While one proceeded to take charge of the bags, the other two forced their way into the room, where the sentinel over the safe of Adams' Express Company had just started to his feet, terrified at the signal of the whistle and the pistol-shot and cry that had reached his ear.

"Come on, we must leave."

Digitized by Google

"No use!" called out Dick Mulligan, pointing his pistol at him; "give us the key."

The poor fellow stood like one dumfounded, hardly comprehending the frightful peril which was upon him.

But there was no time for delay, and the robber took the shortest method to bring him to his senses. Catching him by the throat, he whipped out a fearful-looking knife, and flashing it before his eyes, shouted, "The Key."

The trembling wretch put his hand into his breast-pocket, and after fumbling about a moment took it out empty, and managed to reply loud enough for them to hear:

"It don't open with a key; it is a combination lock."

"Then open it, and be quick about it, or we'll open you."

He turned to obey, but at this juncture the car began bumping over the ties and cross-pieces so furiously that he was unable to do what they commanded.

A moment later the train came to an abrupt standstill, and the guard placed his hand upon the polished knob surrounded by its bewildering rows of figures. As he began turning it he heard voices, and made several false moves, in the hope of gaining time, until his friends could come to his assistance.

The shrewd assassins detected his purpose in an instant, and Dick Mulligan shouted in his gruff voice:

"Another dodge like that, and it will be your last. I've settled the other fellow, and I'd just as lief settle you."

There were now several other men in the car, and the fact that their faces, too, were blackened, and covered with masks, showed the express guard that he had gone too far to retreat.

Several quick, nervous movements, and the ponderous door of the safe was pulled wide open, and revealed the bags of solid coin and the boxes of jewellery within, while the keeper stepped back and waited for the robbers to help themselves.

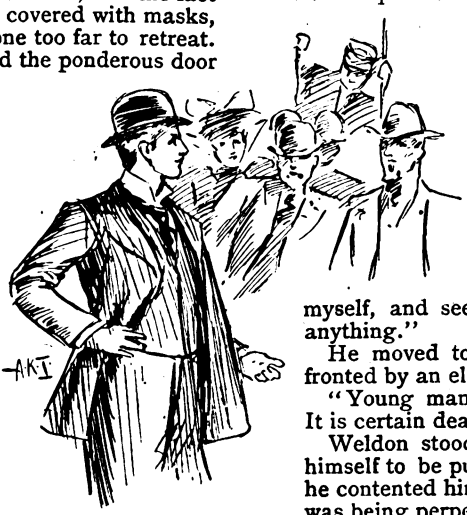
It is needless to say that they did so without any further invitation or delay.

Twenty thousand pounds odd lay nestling there, in the little heavy sacks, and a large quantity of jewellery, which in a twinkling were distributed among the members of the robber party.

In the meantime a couple of them were busy "going through" the mail bags, all unmindful of the poor fellow who lay silent and lifeless beside them.

"Never mind that, Tom," called out Dick Mulligan, looking in upon them. "We haven't time to bother with that."

"What kind of haul have you made?" inquired the individual addressed, rising to his feet, and casting about a bushel of letters from him.



"Gentlemen, how many of you have revolvers?"

"A healthy one; it won't pay to bother about love-letters. Come on; we must leave."

Two minutes later, of the eight masked men not a single one remained visible to the passengers upon the train.

The engine had not yet ceased bounding over the ties when the driver saw several men spring up from the ground, like phantoms, and make towards the car. He needed nothing more to understand what was coming, and he did all that he could do under the circumstances—remained quiescent, and left them free to do as they chose.

"Keep still," he said in a low voice to his fireman who showed a disposition to jump from the engine and run. "Just keep still and say nothing."

"But they may murder us all."

"If you make any fuss and try to run they'll put a bullet through you. They are doing nothing only robbing the express safe, and if we lie low they won't hurt us."

"But what an outrage they are committing!"

"What of it? The Adams' Express Company can stand it, and if they can't, we ain't under any obligation to be shot on their account."

The driver spoke like a philosopher, and the fireman took his advice.

With the violent stopping of the train there was naturally a great commotion created among the passengers. Several thrust their heads out of the windows, but most of them sprang to the ground before the train had fairly come to a stand, and rushed towards the front.

"What's the matter? Anybody killed? Is it a broken rail? Have we got to stay here all night?"

Such and similar were the questions shouted as the frightened men scrambled forward in the darkness. The answer to their questions came in a manner as startling as it was unexpected.

Crack! crack! crack! and several bullets whistled about their ears, and the hoarse voice of Jim Mulligan rang out upon the night air:

"Back, every one of you! Back, I tell you, if you don't want your brains blown out!"

Were it not for the tragic deed that had already been committed, the sudden obedience to this mandate would have been ludicrous. Pell-mell, leaping and tumbling over each other, rolling down the slight declivity scrambling headlong, all the passengers were back in their seats in a much shorter time than they had left them.

Among the different passengers, there was one who was not terrified out of his senses. Fred Weldon, a young man, with a clean shaven face, rose and said:

"Gentleman, how many of you have revolvers?"

After the question was repeated several times, half-a-dozen informed him that they were armed.

"Those Mulligan brothers are at the bottom of this. I propose that we make a fight with them. Besides doing the country a service, there is a chance of making a nice reward for the business. Follow me, and we will teach them a lesson or two."

But not one offered to do so.

"Very well," replied the young man, with an expression of disgust, after he had waited a minute for the response; "if you are afraid, I will take a look myself, and see whether there is a chance for me to do anything."

He moved towards the door, but found himself confronted by an elderly man in spectacles.

"Young man, you don't know what you are doing. It is certain death; remain where you are."

Weldon stood irresolute a minute, but he suffered himself to be pushed back in his seat by his friend, and he contented himself as best he could while the outrage was being perpetrated so close at hand.

When the dead body of the mail agent was found, a gasp of horror escaped the passengers, and Weldon exclaimed impetuously:

"This might have been prevented if you had done as I wished."

"You are mistaken," said the expressman; "he was shot before the train stopped. I heard the pistol."

"We might have punished them, then," he replied.

The body was laid aside, and carefully covered, while the expressman locked the door of the safe, the interior, which so short a time before was filled with such riches, being now empty.

The passengers next turned their attention towards getting the engine back on the rails.

This, it is scarcely necessary to say, was a work of extreme difficulty. All the available wood was wedged and adjusted upon the ties and alongside the rails, and the locomotive, which was blowing off its accumulating steam, lashed and plunged, ran further off, then came nearer the iron, and then missed it again, until all were ready to give up in despair.

But the driver persisted with a patience that never faltered and he was finally rewarded by seeing every wheel in its true position again.

The train resumed its progress, and ten minutes later steamed into La Grange station.

(To be continued.

Digitized by Google

A CONTRARY YOUNG WOMAN.

ON a cliff overhanging the city of Port Mahon, Minorca, is a plaza, called the "Alameda," where a few ilex trees afford a grateful shade. On one of the low stone benches many a pleasant hour may be dreamed away, watching the shadows chase each other over the swelling hills and meadows beyond. Now and again the soft wind wafts perfume from the almond blossoms which lie, like flakes of snow, on the bare fields stretching away to the blue water.

One evening, not long ago, a young girl was seated on the low wall, watching the sun sinking in the cloudless sky. The usual three-cornered mantilla draped her graceful head, and her long slender fingers toyed with the ends hanging over her shoulders. She represented one of the better class, with the intense southern beauty of the peasant idealised. Her black hair waved off a low forehead, guiltless of the pointed "frizz" which disfigures the face of those who ape the Parisian fashion. Her brows were heavy, and her dark eyes, riveted on the harbour below, seemed to reflect the sunset light. She was watching a large yacht, which, with all sails set, was gliding slowly, like some stately bird, to its anchorage.

The rattling of the anchor-chains roused her, and broke the long silence which she had so persistently maintained with her companion, a young man of Spanish type. A mixture of northern blood lightened his olive complexion and refined his sensuous southern features. His waist was circled by a red sash, and his work-worn hands twisted a bright-coloured turban, fashioned from a large handkerchief.

His passionate gaze contrasted strangely with the girl's indifference. "La Bella Jacquita" she was called, and well did she deserve her name! What was he that he should win her after all?

Jacquita looked up and smiled.

As when the sun, breaking through the clouds, bathes the fields in warmth and light, so did that smile transfigure the girl's fair face.

The distant church clock struck six. Rising, she drew the folds of her mantilla closer, and, lifting her eyes to his, said softly: "A Riverdel, Felipe!"

His gaze met hers; pride—anger—passion in his eyes. Mastering his excitement, he spoke: "Jacquita—be careful! I am not like those silly lads who come and go at a girl's nod. To-day I offered you my life, my heart! A man's dearest hopes and desires have I laid bare. How have you answered?"

He waited. Jacquita pushed the gravel petulantly with her foot, watching the pebbles fly, with a half-mocking smile on her lips. Again he spoke:

"I know you are 'La Bella of Mahon,' but I, too, have pride! Keep your scores of admirers, but know that from to-day there is one less—one man more is nothing in the tale of your conquests. You are 'La Bella,' and the man who makes you love him must needs be more than human—stronger than Felipe. Never again will I be ridiculed, mocked as I have been to-day!"

Jacquita trembled slightly, but still smiled. She waited, then looking up, she said, "Felipe, I am sorry——" but Felipe had gone!

That night Jacquita wept—with fear, excitement, and the triumph of having brought Felipe so low as to beg her as he had done that evening. "He will return," thought she. "They always do!"

Next day the party from the yacht made the tour of the town. A little boy of about six years of age was the life and centre of interest of the group. Clad in a sailor suit, his golden curls waving under his white cap, he formed a strong contrast to the dark-skinned children who stared as he passed them by. A pretty blonde girl followed with an elderly gentleman, and as she went along, Jacquita, seeing her exquisite fairness, thought: "The angels must look like that!"

All that day Felipe came not, and the speech of gentle reproof which Jacquita had prepared was not delivered. She began to wonder whether she had better accept him. The fun would then be over, but—supposing the other thing! Life would be as nothing with Felipe left out!

Evening came and found Jacquita and her mother seated at their door, conversing with the neighbours leaning out of the windows or strolling past. The "summer-winter" lingered late that year.

A group gathered—among them Francesca, the rival beauty. She was larger in every way than Jacquita. To many she was more attractive—being less chary of her brilliant smiles and jests.

"Hast heard the news?" she was saying. "As the 'Inglesi' were walking back to the yacht this afternoon, down on the quay, the little boy, catching sight of a large dog ahead, ran after him along the edge of the water. Suddenly, 'Ah, Santissima Maria!' he cried out—and then the water closed over him! Felipe was there and jumped in after him. There was no danger," she added, glancing maliciously at Jacquita's pale face; "and in a moment he was being embraced by the pretty young lady.

"But, Felipe!—Milord overwhelmed him with thanks, offered him money which the silly refused, and finally asked if he knew the sea and would care to come with him as a sailor. For a moment Felipe hesitated. But——" (and here the bright look on Jacquita's face faded)—"he finally said, 'Yes, Milord,' and so he goes to-morrow! Ah, but he is a brave lad that Felipe, and a lucky one! Some of us will care; but to those who have no hearts"—(and here she glanced coldly at the girl sitting silent beside her)—"to those it will make no difference."

Just then Felipe himself sauntered up. There was a difference between this nonchalant young sailor, bearing his honours so lightly, and the passionate lover of the night before. "Good luck, Felipe!" someone called; and Francesca, again the spokeswoman, cried: "Your fame has flown before you, and your good fortune makes us envious."

Felipe turned to Jacquita. She was talking animatedly to a young fellow beside her—seemingly oblivious of all else Felipe's face darkened; then, laughing, he turned, saying: "Come, friends, let us have a merry time on this, our last night, together. Come, drink my health and prosperity with me."

"Si! Si!" they answered.

Jacquita alone declined. She was "too tired," she said haughtily. Francesca, shrugging her shoulders, murmured: "One of her ugly moods! Santissima—what a temper!"

Jacquita listened to the retreating footsteps, and her downcast eye filled with tears—why, she would not own to herself. A quick step sounded, a voice said, "Jacquita!" Something—false pride, perhaps, or fear lest Felipe should see her weeping, held down her eyes—but she smiled.

"Thou didst not say 'Addio,' or even a lucky wish, Jacquita!"

Silence,—then a few smothered words broke from his lips, and ere she could frame the words of farewell still lingering on her tongue, she heard him striding down the street. As he turned the corner, snatches of a waltz—one of Francesca's favourites—came floating back to her. Early the next morning, while the Alameda yet lay wrapped in sleep, a girl leaned over the sea-wall, gazing with burning eyes at the beautiful boat below. The bustle of departure reached her straining ear, and she saw a rowing-boat speed out to the ship. A cheer rose from those on shore as, with a final pull, the anchor was hauled aboard. The broad sails filled slowly, and she slipped away as silently as she had come—away into the purple mists of the morning—away, and bearing with her a whole life's grief and disappointment.

"'La Bella Jacquita' is going daft," cried Francesca as every night the girl walks to the Alameda, watching for a boat that never comes.

One evening she sat gazing at a "tramp" steamer just anchored. She recalled that other night—and the boat now so far away. Alas for the pride of "La Bella of Mahon!" The setting sun covered her with its golden light. Her dark eyes grew larger with unshed tears; then a voice said softly, "I have come back to see if thou wilt yet say 'Addio,' mia Jacquita!"

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SUMMER HEAT AND OBESITY.

Summer with its sultry heat, is not a source of unmixed pleasure to those who suffer from excessive corpulence. Health cannot be maintained under conditions of great obesity. In general the mental energy of the highly corpulent becomes impaired, and their capacity for the conduct of business is consequently much diminished. Our readers will therefore be interested to know it is an indisputable fact that excessive corpulency can, in all cases, be cured by the system which has now for many years been successfully practised by Mr. F. C. RUSSELL, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Mr. Russell possesses hundreds of testimonials from persons in all classes of society, many of them holding distinguished positions in the learned professions and in Her Majesty's services, which, taken collectively, prove to a demonstration that anyone suffering from obesity who systematically applies his remedy for a few weeks consecutively can be cured. The patients under his treatment are not asked to be "fasting men"; and it is remarkable that in the case of many of Mr. Russell's subjects their appetite increases as their weight diminishes. A book (256 pages) entitled, "Corpulency and the Cure," containing most interesting and trustworthy information, together with the recipe, may be had by writing to Mr. Russell, enclosing 4d. stamps for postage. With such a remedial agent at their command as Mr. Russell's specific, excessively corpulent persons have only themselves to blame if their unwieldy persons are not speedily reduced to fitting proportions.—Extract from a Leading Journal.

TO METAMORPHOSE FAT PERSONS

"We were reading in the Penny Illustrated Paper how to reduce obesity, wherein it says in that very excellent publication: 'The corpulent will be glad to learn how to lose two stone in about a month with benefit to health, strength, and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular fact that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state with increased activity of brain, digestive, and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto; yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one to two pounds daily, as the weighing machine will prove. The Book, "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), containing the "recipe," can be had gratis from Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., by sending cost of postage, fourpence.' He has discovered a simple herbal remedy, most pleasant to the taste, which entirely disposes of the necessity of starving oneself in endeavouring to be rid of all superfluous matter. An interesting point, which goes to prove that the almost magical compound is beyond doubt harmless, is that in prescribing it in a tentative way to lean persons, or rather to those who carry no superfluity of fat beyond that which is required as fuel for Nature's furnace, the medicine is absolutely inoperative, attacking only that unhealthy, disease-creating waste accumulation which is the burden of the fat creature's existence. In many cases where people take decoctions reputed to be new medical discoveries to cure some specific disease, they may recover by the action of the medicine, or Nature may have effected her own cure. In the case of corpulency, if a simple remedy undertakes to reduce a person, say, 7 lb. in a week, all that one has to do is to get weighed, and thus prove it conclusively. So it is with Mr. Russell's compound, but he asks you to prove it in twenty-four hours only."—Coventry Standard, January 18, 1895.

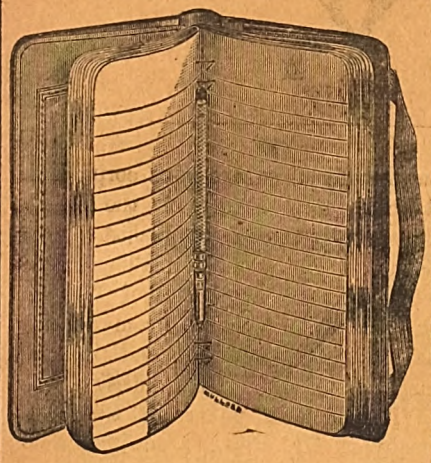
Digitized by Google

COLLINS'
"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK,
WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST AND THE BEST.
THE SIMPLEST AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register" the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,
Bridewell Place, London, E.C.; 139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

MARVELLOUS INCREASE IN CIRCULATION!!

SHORT STORIES.
A 20pp. 4to. Weekly Magazine.

It is now but two years since this magazine came into the hands of Mr. C. Arthur Pearson. It has during that period more than DOUBLED ITS CIRCULATION. This has been caused chiefly by the vast improvement in its literary standard, and the increased facilities for publication. Further efforts in this direction are being made, and a consequent further advance in circulation is confidently anticipated.

A NEW SERIAL STORY HAS JUST COMMENCED.

No advance in the rates for advertisements has been made, nor is any contemplated until the circulation has reached

100,000 COPIES WEEKLY.

The scale is 10s. per inch, or £10 per page; and, as the advertisements are limited to four pages, the most effective publicity is ensured.

ADVERTISEMENT OFFICE:
17, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

RUBBER STAMPS FREE BY POST. AGENTS WANTED Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd.,
92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

RUPTURE CURED
WITHOUT OPERATION. S.J. Sherman, Hernia Specialist, 64, Chancery Lane, London; 26, King Street, Manchester; now sends his new Book of full information, post free, 7d.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

OVER 2,000 New and Secondhand. EASY TERMS —From 10s. per month. Lists (200 page) and Testimonials post free. BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO., Liverpool; 45, Everton Road, and 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W. (close to Euston Road).

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID SERIAL STORY JUST STARTED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 339. FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 29, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

1 RISING SUN STOVE POLISH. EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD.

In HALF the TIME with HALF the LABOUR you can produce MORE POLISH with TWO Penny Packets of RISING SUN than with HALF-DOZEN of ordinary Blacklead.

Sold in ½d., 1d. & 2d. Packets

THREE GREAT BOONS

3 MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS GLOSS, BORAX, GUM, WAX, &c. &c.

REQUIRES no addition or preparation. SAVES time, labour, and uncertainty. PRODUCES beautiful white glossy linen. Sold in 1d. Packets, or 3d. and 6d. Boxes.

Sample of any one post free 2 stamps C. Chancellor & Co., London, E.C.

2 RISIN' SUN METAL POLISH. GIVES TO ALL KINDS OF METALS A BEAUTIFUL SOFT BRILLIANT POLISH.

With the MINIMUM of LABOUR this LIQUID POLISH produces a MOST BRILLIANT APPEARANCE, which lasts much longer than that produced by any Paste Polish.

Sold in 1d, 3d, 6d, & 1/- Bottles

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.

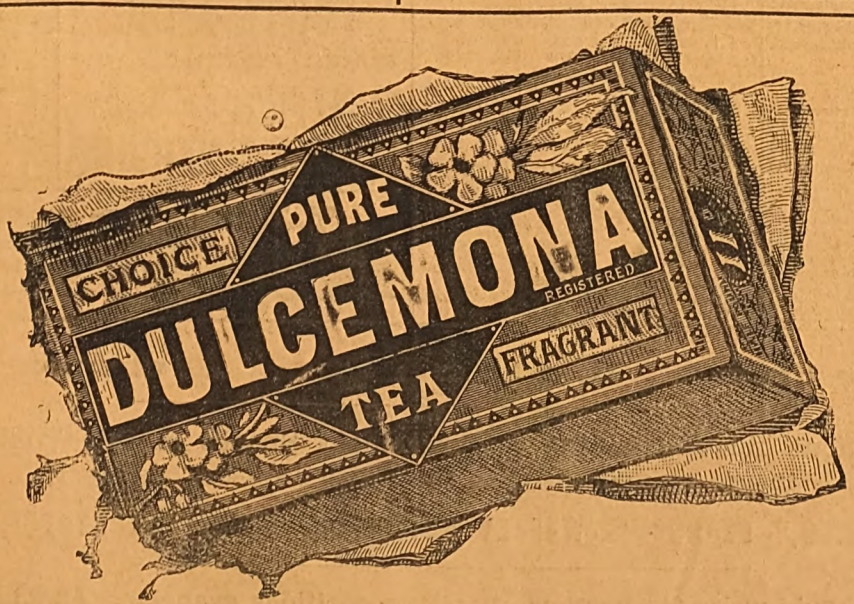
SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S, LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

THE QUEEN says:
"Dulcemona Tea is EXCELLENT, MOST DELICATE in FLAVOUR, and REFRESHING to a degree."



1/6, 1/10, 2/-, 2/4, 2/6 and 3/- per Pound,
In Lead Packets and 1 lb., 3 lb. and 5 lb. Tins only.

AGENTS EVERYWHERE—FIRST-CLASS GROCERS. WHOLESALE ONLY: 11 & 11a, UPPER THAMES STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 20 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

ECZEMA

and Skin Diseases of all kinds can be cured at once if you

Use "ANTEXEMA."

This is sold by all Chemists and Drug Stores, or may be had post free for 1s 8d., 2s. 9d., or 4s. 9d., of the ANTEXEMA Co., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W.—Drop a post-card to us, mentioning this paper, and we will send you, post free, a Little Book, containing valuable information about Skin Diseases of all kinds.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms. two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free. Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

RUPTURE CURED

WITHOUT OPERATION, S. J. Sherman, Hernia Specialist, 64, Chancery Lane, London; 26, King Street, Manchester; now sends his new Book of full information, post free, 7d.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES.

Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

TO INVENTORS.

An Invention Protected for £1. Handbook, "How to Patent an Invention," giving full particulars, forms, &c., free from HUGHES & YOUNG, "Patent Editors" to the principal newspapers, 23, Coleman Street, London, E.C. Established 1829. INVENTORS ASSISTED IN WORKING OR SELLING INVENTIONS. Read "Patents."

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, (Rooms O), Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

ONE BOX OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use

Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.

1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY, Balham Hill, London, S.W.

Beware of injurious imitations.

New Harrison. SWIFT GOLD MEDAL.

KNITTER

KNITS STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" & "SUN" Machines.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker.

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(really genuine.)

in patent air-tight tins, ½lb., 1s. 2d., 1 lb., 2s., 2 lbs., 3s. 9d., including tin and postage.

Mrs. CONYERS,
Kilkhampton, Shalton, N. Devon.

HAIR DESTROYED

Root and Branch absolutely exterminated without injury to the skin, entirely new treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BALDNESS CURED

in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticisms, and valuable Pamphlet containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Address Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

OVER 2,000 New and Second-hand EASY TERMS —From 10s. per month. Lists (200 page) and Testimonials post free. BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO., Liverpool; 45, Everton Road, and 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W. (close to Euston Road).

Important Notice to Advertisers.

All communications relating to the Advertisement Spaces in this Publication should in future be addressed to the Advertisement Manager,

"SHORT STORIES," PEARSON'S WEEKLY BUILDINGS, HENRIETTA STREET, LONDON, W.C.

ADVERTISERS should write for Particulars of the positions available. Announcements carefully designed and displayed.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 339.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 29, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

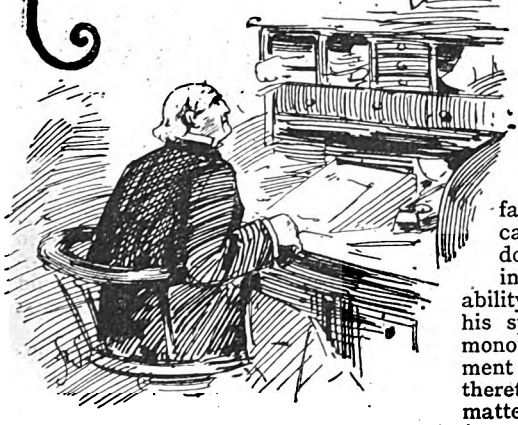
A MORAL THERMOMETER



THOSE who remember my father-in-law, Peter Trask, Esq., before he was my father-in-law, can have no doubts regarding a leopard's ability to change his spots, or the monotone integument appertaining thereto, for that matter. Then he was a terror that waked at all hours; now he is as gentle as any sucking dove. Then he was feared; now he is loved—and it speaks volumes for his legal skill that his practice has not suffered from the mutation. For a lawyer is like vinegar, the sharper, the more cutting he is, the more thoroughly is he supposed to have worked.

I had just graduated with honours at college, when I was placed as an articled clerk in Peter Trask's office. The selection was natural, but cruel, as things are apt to be. He had been a close friend of my father's—I never did understand my father—and was still the trustee of his estate. He was easily first among the lawyers in town, and being easily first, was also the crankiest, the ugliest, the most arrogant; the dread of the bar, and the torture of the bench.

I remember well the day I entered his private office, where he sat surrounded by books, like a bear with winter provender.

"Humph!" he growled, and eyed me from head to foot. How guilty I instantly felt that my hair was parted in the middle, and that I wore patent leather shoes; how regretful that I was not bald and shod with cowhide! "Humph!" he repeated. "So you are Edwin Gordon, son of my old friend James Gordon, hey? No wonder he died! What earthly use are you, eh?" And I sincerely wished that I was one of those distant hills to which his voice was so evidently directed.

"Do you imagine you can ever become a man like me?" he continued. "A pretty figure you'd make addressing a jury or a court!"

I faltered that I hoped to qualify myself for a lawyer.

"Oh, a lawyer!" he sneered, with an unpleasant laugh—that is, with his laugh. "Here, take this bundle to Mr. Matthew Sharpun, and leave these briefs at the bindery. And, mind, sweep out and dust the office every morning. That may take some of the law-school nonsense out of you."

As I passed through the outer room, old Stiles, the clerk, looked up longingly. "I wish he'd send me on errands," he said. "I'd willingly wear a Scotch cap and knickerbockers, that I would."

I must say it was a relief to be out of doors, though the weather was stormy; besides, I had a great curiosity to see Mr. Matthew Sharpun, of whom I had heard so much. He was an old friend of my mother's, a romantic old friend I've sometimes fancied; a man of substance, who lived on the outskirts of the town, and devoted his solitary bachelorhood to the investigation of scientific problems.

As I reached the corner of a bye-street, I came upon a young lady in a quandary. A pretty young lady, too, despite the knitted brows and pursed lips, indicative of that quandary. She was laden with two parcels and an umbrella, and at her heels was the daintiest little Skye terrier in the world—a knot of silver thread twisted around two diamond eyes. A tram was approaching, but she knew, and I knew, that the only unpaid advertisement on its boards was the commandment: "No dogs allowed."

"Permit me," I said, and in an instant the little terrier was safe within his mistress's wrap, and I held the umbrella and the parcels.

"Poor, dear little Judy!" sighed the maiden. "I do hope she won't catch cold." But Judy peeped out at me as if saying that it was not she that was out in the cold.

"You are so very kind," protested the young lady when she was comfortably settled, and I had cautioned the conductor to assist her in alighting, as she had a stiff arm.

And then I hurried away, wondering at the charming obtuseness which could so ingenuously blame parcels instead of terrier.

Matthew Sharpun himself answered my ring at his door—a tall, lean man, with a dark, kindly face, close shaven and deep wrinkled, and with eyes that shone with a melancholy humour.

"So you are Nellie Gordon's son," he began, and I half expected him to say that my mother ought to be dead. "Well, you resemble her a little, and that's high praise, my boy. And you've put your head into the legal lion's den, have you, and it isn't altogether snapped off? Come in and tell me how you escaped."

I told him.

"Trask is a self-made man," he explained apologetically. "There is no such lawyer as Peter Trask. The trouble is, that he knows it as thoroughly as he knows everything else."

"I think my appearance irritates him," I suggested.

"Any appearance irritates him except his own fiery visage, and if he could really see that, it would irritate him most of all. I do believe I am his only friend. We get along swimmingly, and I'll tell you why. I always ask him to do exactly what I don't want him to do, and, of course, he eagerly adopts the opposite. I might teach him a lesson if it were worth while. But there, get back to your work, Edwin. Remember you have a friend in me. If you get into trouble with him, it will be worth my while to teach that lesson, I promise you."

This kindly greeting encouraged me to persist at the office, and that afternoon an event occurred which fully determined me. I was sitting in the outer room when the door opened, and lo! the pretty young lady, prettier than before for the lack of the quandary, glided through into the awful sanctum

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

sanctorum—Anglice, lair—beyond. Was I mistaken, or had there been a flash of recognition from dark eyes, tremulously recorded by smiling lips? If I was mistaken, that was an error which any man might be well content to hug.

Old Stiles, the clerk, was pottering away at his desk against the wall—poor old Stiles, in comparison with whose meekness Moses was a dancing dervish of impatience. An orthodox man was old Stiles; he believed firmly in eternal punishment, indeed, he sighed for it. "I think it would be cooler there," he said to me, one day, with a fearsome glance towards the rear room. Him I at once interrogated regarding this vision of loveliness.

"You'd better keep your eyes to yourself," advised old Stiles, in homely phrase. "That's Miss Alice, Mr. Trask's only child. He thinks almost as much of her as he does of himself."

Due reflection over, this excess of paternal affection might have made me cautious, but before I had time to consider, Miss Alice passed through again. I sprang forward and opened the door.

"Thank you, Mr. Gordon," she said.

"I trust you have fully recovered the use of your arm," I stammered.

"As you see," and she offered me her hand.

Another bewildering flash and entrancing reflex of a smile, and I was alone with old Stiles.

There was a Banshee wail, as if the north wind were having a convulsion. I looked inquiringly at old Stiles. "He's calling you," he said, with an indicative thumb, and a why-should-we-mourn-departing-friends' expression, and I hurried away to my doom.

"My daughter tells me that you were of some slight assistance to her puppy," Mr. Trask began. "What is that quotation about being wondrous kind? I beg to say that any such interference is as unnecessary as it is impertinent. Had they dared to molest Judy, a favourite of mine, and singularly attached to me, I would have taken away their licence in a five-minute argument. That will do; and don't let it happen again."

Mr. Trask's cool insolence made me the warmer. His contempt was a spur to my interest. A maiden is never so sought as when she is shut up in an inaccessible tower, especially if from the topmost window she waves her kerchief. Thenceforth I had one purpose—to overcome all obstacles between Alice and me.

A pretty young lady, too.

One evening I sat in old Matthew Sharpun's study before a cosy grate, and explained my fears, for my hopes spoke for themselves.

"I think I could teach Trask a lesson," responded Matthew. "It will be a hard one, and therefore well worth learning. He is universally disliked, poor man. And yet he believes himself to be not only popular, but beloved. Now, in my biological investigations I have observed that every emotion, whether pleasurable or disagreeable, causes a sensitive, impalpable essence to radiate from the person subject to it. I have discovered, too, a medium which infallibly responds to and indicates every variation of this ethereal emanation. Look here, what do you make of this?" and he showed me a small glass tube containing a blue fluid, which was delicately graduated and marked along its side with such stages as "Love," "Regard," "Indifference," "Contempt," and "Hate," reading from the bottom to the top.

"Why?" I replied, "This looks like a sort of moral thermometer."

Matthew Sharpun laughed aloud, as if taken with the name.

"Good!" he exclaimed. "That's exactly what it is. Now, if a man will wear this little instrument concealed on his person, it will indicate the exact feelings towards him entertained by whomsoever he may accost."

"Great Scott!" I cried. "No wonder its colour is blue."

"Now," continued Matthew, with an inventor's enthusiasm, "I propose to induce our self-sufficient friend to wear this silent monitor just for one day, and then we shall see what we shall see, or, rather, he will."

"But, how?" I objected. "How will you ever bell the cat?"

"Oh, I shall simply mention it in casual conversation with him as an amusing toy, and then say, 'But, of course, you wouldn't dare to wear it!' And mark you, Edwin, my boy, he would insist on wearing a hundred if I had them. What will be the consequences? Why, he'll find everyone false and hostile, except you, his faithful servitor. Naturally, then, will he cling to you and love you as a son. Besides, this rude awakening, this real view, may ——"

"Hold on!" I interrupted. "Your main hypothesis is a broken reed. Why, the moment I approached him the blue liquor would fly so rapidly to 'Hate' as to burst the tube, in all probability."

"I have provided for that contingency. Put these soles inside your shoes; they are composed of a substance which will completely insulate you. Your appearance alone will affect the register."

"I cultivate the constant smile of a Cheshire cat!" I cried exultingly. "Oh, when will the blessed experiment begin? I'm as anxious as a grand inquisitor to see him stretched on the gridiron."

"I will see him to-night," promised Matthew. "And so, courage and hope!"

The next morning, as I proceeded to the office with my feet very strong of sole, I reflected as to whether I should give Alice and her mother an inkling of this dread ordeal. In many ways Mrs. Trask had shown a limp and languid preference for my cause, this meditating revenge, amid the horrors of her connubial prison-house. Would they not both, then, redouble their fervour? But could they? Why seek for excess in intensity. Let them be natural. Trask's worst enemy could not ask for more. In their ignorance there surely would be no bliss for him.

Old Stiles was busy with some hurried task as I entered the office, and therefore undeniably cross, for old Stiles's conception of work provided frequent pauses for thought. I was scarcely seated at my desk when there came from the inner room an uproar as if a dozen steam boilers had exploded in unison, and old Stiles came flying out with a huge law tome after him. "Save yourself!" he shrieked. "He's tuk at last, as I know'd he would be," and he tapped his head significantly as he dashed out into the street.

I own I hesitated when, a moment later, I heard my name roared out on the trembling air. My flesh quivered, my toes contracted! Oh, lucky qualm, I felt the insulating soles, and from their mysterious substance I drew reassurance! With a smile, embodying the beatitudes, I boldly marched to my fate.

Digitized by Google

Peter Trask was standing in a familiar attitude, with his frock coat unbuttoned and his left hand holding out its lapel. So I had often seen him stand when about to address a jury; but now I knew the posture enabled him to consult the moral thermometer concealed within the folds.

"And you, too, you miserable——," he roared, and glanced, down. "And you, too, you ——," he repeated gruffly, and glanced again. "Oh, my good, true Edwin," he cried, in dulcet tones. "I merely wanted to ask you how you are getting on."

Ah, how I did smile as I answered that I hoped that I appreciated the blessing of my connection with him.

"I am sure you do, my boy," he asserted. "Your frank, ingenuous face shows your loyal nature. Will you come home to dinner with us to-night? The infamous duplicity of that reptile Stiles passes the bounds of belief. And I have warmed him in my bosom for years, and loaded him with benefits. But, there, I won't rack your soul with such enormities."

"My soles are undergoing quite a strain," I reflected, as we went out of the office together that night.

I actually felt a glow of sympathy towards the poor man as we progressed: he kept peeping quite timidly at the thermometer to see if there wasn't some mistake, and I do believe he wouldn't have noticed any difference in me had I taken the shoes from off my feet. Still, perhaps it is more prudent to be quite sure of the ground on which one stands. Moved, then, by some compunction, I administered the panacea of flattery so skilfully that ere he reached the house he was chatting naturally—that is, as if I were on the other side of the street.

A wretched tramp of a man lurched by with a meagre cur at his heels. "There goes fidelity," said Trask. "One can always rely on the affections of a dog. Why, our little Judy watches for me like a child." And, sure enough, scarcely had he withdrawn his latchkey when there was a scampering down the stairs, and there sat Judy, with devotion beaming from her bright, expressive eyes.

"You dear little thing—get out, you beast," roared Trask. And he kicked the astonished pup to the end of the hall. He had tested her "fidelity" with the moral thermometer.

The man shook as with ague. "That is too much. That settles it," he muttered. "Since there is one at least whom I can trust, I must bind him to me. Come in here, Edwin; I have something serious to say to you."

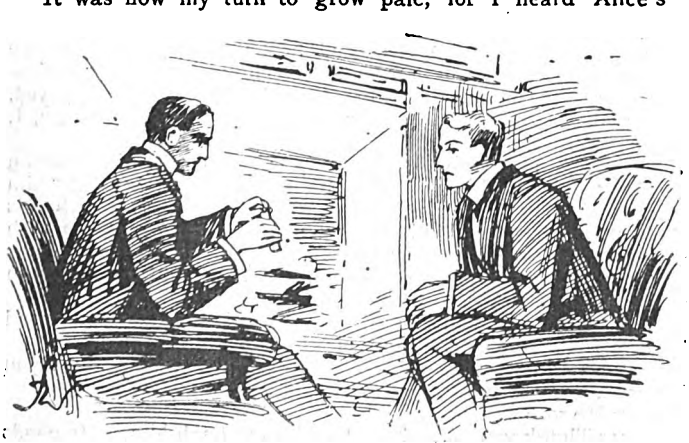
When we were seated in the library, he continued:

"Am I right in suspecting some tender passages between Alice and you?"

"I love her passionately," I protested.

"Then you shall have her, since thus I shall gain a son."

It was now my turn to grow pale, for I heard Alice's



He showed me a small glass tube.

Hid his fiery visage in his wife's lap.

approaching steps. I knew her frank, ingenuous nature. Supposing her father should apply his test? Evidently a like thought occurred to him, for he shivered and buttoned his coat tightly around him. After explanations and ecstasies had somewhat moderated: "Where is your mother, my child?" asked Peter Trask.

"She is lying down. She is not feeling very well, but nothing out of the ordinary," explained Alice, coldly.

"I will go to her at once."

"Oh, no, she didn't even want me with her! She craves rest and quiet."

"Then I will go for the doctor," and despite a gesture of restraint, he rushed away.

"An extraordinary, inexplicable interest," said Alice bitterly. "Poor mamma! As if any one could administer to a broken heart!"

We waited. Ere long there were whispers in the hall, and then a single professional tread up the stairs. Soon the dignified steps returned, and an unctuous voice spoke. "Our patient is doing finely," the doctor reported to Peter Trask. "No organic trouble; only a lowering of the nervous system, only a lack of life. I will call in the morning."

"Only a lack of life!" moaned poor Trask, as he joined us. "Come, my children, let us tell your engagement to mother; it may please her;" and we went upstairs into the sitting-room, where the invalid lay on the couch.

"See, my dear," said Peter Trask. "These young people think they love each other. Perhaps they do; but I doubt if they can be as happy as we used to be; as, as happy as—we might be." And he knelt and hid his fiery visage in his wife's lap.

I have, I think, described Mrs. Trask as limp and languid from the horrors of her connubial prison-house, and so truly she had appeared to me. But now I witnessed a wondrous transformation. Her wan and sunken cheeks grew rosy; her dull eyes softened with reminiscent tenderness. She smiled; and if ever a smile spoke, that smile uttered a blessing.

"Why, Peter, why, my own true hubby," she murmured, "one would think that the dear old days had returned, and you were my ardent fair-haired lover again"; and she stroked the shiny surface where that fair hair had been.

Peter Trask staggered to his feet and over to the light. He unbuttoned his coat, and looked down through tear-dimmed eyes. There stood the blue fluid, in the moral thermometer, constant and serene at "Love."

Digitized by Google

THEY were telling stories of hunting and adventure after dinner. An old friend of ours, M. Boniface—a mighty Nimrod and great drinker of wine; a gay, robust man, full of spirit, of wit, of philosophy; a mocking, resigned philosophy that manifested itself in cutting witticisms, but never in sadness—said suddenly: "I know a hunting story, or, rather, a hunting drama. Strange enough, it is not at all like the general run of such stories. I have never related it, thinking that it would not be amusing. It is not a sympathetic story, you understand. That is, it has not that interest that stirs one, or charms or touches one.

"Here is the story:

"When this occurred I was about thirty-five years old and a keen hunter. I owned at that time a very isolated farm in the environs of Jumieges, surrounded by forests and well stocked with hares and rabbits. I passed only three or four days in the year there, and always alone, because the arrangement of the place did not provide accommodation for a friend. I had placed there as a guard an old retired gendarme, a brave, rather violent man, a terror to poachers, strict in his discipline, and afraid of nothing. He lived alone, far from the village, in a little house, or rather hovel, consisting of two rooms below, a kitchen and cellar, and two rooms above. One of them, which was nothing but a box, just big enough for a bed, a cupboard and a chair, was reserved for me. Father Cavalier occupied the other. When I said he lived alone in the lodge I did not express myself clearly. He had taken his nephew to live with him. He was a worthless fellow of some fourteen years, who went errands to the village, three kilomètres distant, and helped his uncle in his daily cares.

"This scapegrace, tall and crooked, had yellow hair—so light that it looked like the down on a duck's breast; so thin that he looked as though he was bald. He had enormous feet and giant hands, the hands of a colossus. He squinted a little and never looked anyone straight in the face. He seemed to me to hold the same place in the human race that poisonous beasts do in the animal kingdom. The fellow was a human fox or polecat. During my short visits at the 'Pavilion'—I called this hut the Pavilion—Marius gave up the niche to an old woman, Céleste, from Ecorcheville, who came to look after the cooking, the efforts of Père Cavalier in that line being insufficient.

"Now you know the place and the characters let us proceed to the adventure. It was on October 15, 1854. I remember the date distinctly, and I shall never forget it. I went to Rouen on horseback, followed by my dog, Bock, a great Dalmatian hound, broad chested, with massive jaws. He beat the bushes for game like a spaniel from Pont Andemer. I carried my travelling bag on the crupper, my gun slung over my shoulder. It was a cold day, with great gloomy clouds flitting across the sky and a strong wind howling.

"As I climbed up Cantelère, I looked away over the vast valley through which the Seine wound like a serpent. The towers of Rouen touched the sky to the left, and far off on the right stretched the wood-covered fields. For ten years at that same time I had presented myself in the same fashion, and the same words from the same lips had greeted me:

"'Good day, monsieur. Is your health satisfactory?' Cavalier had not changed.

"The old woman, a devoted soul, always seemed moved when she saw me, and every time I left would say: 'I think this may be the last time, our dear master.'

"This desolate, timid farewell of the poor old servant, this enforced resignation and expectation of her approaching death, always touched my heart.

"I got off my horse. Cavalier, after shaking my hand warmly, led the horse away to the little building that served as a stable, and followed Céleste into the kitchen, that was also used as a dining-room. There the keeper joined me.

"I saw at once that he did not look as usual. He seemed pre-occupied, ill at ease, anxious. I said: 'Well, Cavalier, does everything go to please you?' He muttered:

"'Yes and no. There is something I do not like.'

"I asked, 'What is it, my good fellow?' He shook his head.

"'Not yet, sir. I don't want to trouble you till it is necessary.'

"I insisted, but he absolutely refused to enlighten me before dinner. I understood it must be a serious affair. Thinking of nothing else to say, I remarked:

"'Is there plenty of game?'

"'Oh,' he replied, 'the game is plenty. You will find all you wish. Thank heaven! I can keep your eye on that.'

"He said this with so much gravity, so much grief, it was nearly comical. His heavy grey moustache drooped mournfully over his lips.

"Suddenly I bethought myself I had not yet seen his nephew. 'Where is Marius? Why does he not show himself?' The guard jumped and looked me suddenly in the face.

"'Well, monsieur, I had rather tell you that after a while; yes, I had rather. It is on his account I am worried.'

"'Ah. Well, where is he?'

"'He is in the stable, sir. I am waiting for him to come.'

"'What has he done?'

"'This is the story, sir.'

"And the old man hesitated, his voice changed, trembled. His face became wrinkled all at once with the lines of old age. He spoke slowly:

"'Well, I have seen this winter traces of poachers in the Rosary Woods, but have not been able to catch anyone. I passed night after night there, sir, to no effect. Then they began to lay snares in the woods in Ecorcheville. I had grown thin with watching; but when it came to taking the marauders, it was impossible. You would have said they foresaw my intentions, my plans.

"'But one day, as I brushed Marius' coat, his Sunday coat, I found four sous in his pockets. Where had the boy got them?

"'I thought about it for eight days, and I found he went out—he went out just as I went to bed. Yes, monsieur.

"'Then I watched him, but without his suspecting it—oh, yes, without that. And one night I went to bed before he went out; then I followed him. He could not follow as noiselessly as I, monsieur. And there I came upon him, yes, Marius, setting traps on your ground, sir—he, my nephew, I, your keeper.

"'My blood rushed to my head, and I nearly killed him on the spot, I beat him so. Yes, I beat him, and I promised him that when you came I should correct him with my own hands in your presence. This is why I have nearly perished with sorrow. He has neither father nor mother, this boy, he has no relatives but me. I have kept him, I could not cast him off, could I?

"'But if he should do so again, there is an end of it, an end of pity. Have I done right, sir?'

"I held out my hand. 'You have done well, Cavalier; you are a brave man.'

"He rose.

"'Thank you, sir. Now I will go to fetch him. He needs punishment.'

"I knew it would be useless to try to dissuade the old man. I let him follow out his own humour. He went to seek the rascal, and led him in by the ear. I was seated upon a straw chair, with the grave face of a judge. Marius had grown and seemed uglier to me than ever, with his shy, sullen manner. His uncle pushed him before me, with his military air.

Digitized by Google

"'Ask pardon of the landlord.'

"The boy would not utter a word. Then the old gentleman seized him under the arms, and, throwing him to the ground, began to flog him so violently that I rose to interfere. The child howled: 'Pardon! pardon! pardon! I promise!'

"Cavalier raised him from the ground, and, forcing him to his knees before me, said: 'Ask pardon.' The rascal murmured with lowered eyes:

"'I ask pardon.'

"Then his uncle dealt him a parting slap that sent him flying. He ran out, and I saw him no more that evening. Cavalier came back trembling.

"'He has a bad nature,' he said; and during dinner he repeated:

"'Oh, I am so sorry, sir; you don't know how sorry I am.'

"I tried to console him, but in vain. I went to bed early, that I might start hunting in time. My dog was sleeping on the floor at the foot of my bed when I extinguished my candle. I was awakened in the middle of the night by Bock's furious barking, and I saw instantly that my room was full of smoke. I sprang from my bed, lighted my candle, ran to the door and opened it. A whirlwind of flame entered. The house was on fire! I closed the heavy oak door quickly, and, putting on my coat, let my dog out of the window by means of a rope formed by my bed-clothes. Then, throwing my garments out, followed by my game-bag and gun, I escaped in the same manner. I cried at the top of my voice:

"'Cavalier! Cavalier!' But the keeper did not awake. He slept the heavy sleep of an old gendarme. Through the windows I saw the lower part of the house was a fiery furnace, and I saw that it had been filled with straw to favour the flames. Who could have set it on fire? I commenced to call furiously—

"'Cavalier!' Then the thought occurred to me that he was suffocated with the smoke.

"I had an inspiration, and slipping a cartridge in my gun, I fired a shot through his window. The six panes of glass fell inside in fragments. This time the old man heard, and he appeared in his shirt, dazed by the light that blazed before his house. I cried: 'Your house is on fire! Jump out of the window, quick!' The flames burst out of the door and window and threatened to swallow him. He sprang out and alighted on his feet like a cat, and just in time. The thatched roof broke in the middle and the stairway made a draught for the fire that roared below. An immense red sheaf of flame rose in the air. It spread out like a column of water and scattered a shower of sparks all round the cottage, and in a few moments there was nothing but a mass of flames. Cavalier asked in a fright:

"'How did it happen?'

"I replied: 'They set fire in the kitchen.' He muttered:

"'Who could have done it?'

"And I cried out instinctively, 'Marius!'

"The old man understood. He faltered: 'Oh, Mother of God! Was it for that he did not come in?'

"Then a horrible thought struck me. I cried, 'Céleste, Céleste!'

"He said nothing, but the house lay crumbling before us, nothing now but a fiery furnace—brilliant, dazzling, bloody, a formidable funeral pile, where the poor woman now lay nothing but a charred mass.

"The fire reached the neighbouring shed. I thought of my horse, and Cavalier ran to let him out. He had hardly opened the stable door before a rapid, nimble body rushed out, passing between his legs and knocking him on his face. It was Marius fleeing with all his strength. The old man was up in a moment. He wanted to run and catch the miserable wretch, but, knowing he could not, he was seized with an irresistible fury, and, yielding to one of those sudden, irrational impulses, that no one can foresee or hinder, he took my gun that lay near him, shouldered it, and before I could prevent he fired, without knowing whether or not it was loaded. One barrel was not discharged when I fired through the window, and the charge struck the flying boy in the back, and he fell on his face covered with blood. He pawed the earth with his hands and knees like a wounded animal that seeks to escape. I raised him up. He was already dying. He expired without saying a word. Cavalier, still in his shirt, his limbs bare, stood near us, stupefied, motionless. When the people came from the village they carried my keeper away.

"I appeared as witness at the trial and I related the facts, concealing nothing. Cavalier was acquitted. But he disappeared the next day, leaving the country. I never saw him again.

"This, gentlemen, is my hunting story."

MY HINDOO SERVANT.

My servant, Sajad, was by no means an extraordinary fellow. I picked him up in Benares, one scorching afternoon in midsummer. I was in want of a kitmutgar, and he seemed to have nothing to do. He could not speak one word of English, and, to tell the truth, that was the first and only recommendation upon which I engaged him.

In religion he was a Mussulman, but he was far from being devout; indeed, I very soon rated him as rather below the average in everything. However, as I did not require anything remarkable, we got on well enough to the end; for he followed me—poor fellow—to his death.

Steal? Most decidedly. He would invariably steal anything belonging to me that attracted his fancy. If I discovered it and went to work in the right way, I could usually get it back.

Sajad never left me for an hour from the time he entered my service. He followed me all day, and slept on a rug at my door or lay on the sand at my feet or just outside my tent, at night, as the case might be, and he received just as many lectures on veracity and made just as many promises as the time allowed; but I am sure that he told me just as many lies the last week of his life as he did in the first week he was with me. It is as much the nature of the Oriental to lie and steal, as it is of a dog to bark at a horse, or of a cat to help herself to cream.

One who expects too much is apt to give credit for too little. That may be the reason the Hindoo has such a bad reputation in the minds of some who mean to be just, or even generous. Many a good turn Sajad did me, right in the line of those two straits. It takes a rogue to catch a rogue, and I know that he saved me from being robbed by others many times over for all that he took himself, while he would detect a lie in what any one else told me as naturally as a duck would take to water.

We were marching through the Terai once with a small detachment. A soldier was leading my horse, while I walked upon one side of the path, followed at a little distance by Sajad, hunting for a bird I had shot and which had fallen in the tall grass. Suddenly there was a cry from those behind. I looked quickly over my shoulder.

Digitized by Google

A hooded cobra, disturbed by the commotion I was making, had risen out of the grass just behind me. His flat head and flaring hood were already thrown back for a final fling at me. His half-open mouth was within three feet of my face when my eyes rested upon it. If I turned, I should only expose more of my face. If I lifted a hand, he would strike it quicker than lightning. There was no chance to get away, and I was utterly helpless.

Before I had time to think a second thought, however, Sajad made one leap from where he was standing, and before his feet had touched the ground he had brought his staff with a sharp whirr, as it cut the air, too quick even for a snake to dodge, and the next instant the cobra's body was writhing in the grass, while his head, completely severed, fell at my feet.

Had Sajad waited an instant he would have been too late. No one else could have reached me; yet if he had missed his aim, or the snake had dodged, his own life would have paid the forfeit. No one knew it better than Sajad himself, but he took the chance and saved my life. He had in his girdle at the time a bright-coloured silk handkerchief which he had stolen from me, and only that morning had solemnly declared that he knew nothing about it.

Up in the hills, one afternoon, I was lying on a low tent-bed taking a nap, when Sajad saw a poisonous insect, a kind of scorpion, crawling over my pillow. He had nothing near to use as a weapon, and no time to lose. He caught it in his naked hand, and threw it out of the tent-door. I woke in time to see it flying through the air, and, hurrying out, killed it before it got away.

I called to Sajad to ask if he had escaped a sting, and, receiving a cheerful reply in the affirmative, thought no more about it till, chancing to enter the tent softly and unexpectedly, I found him sucking the back of his right hand for dear life. He stopped the instant he saw me, and put the hand behind him.

The poison had already begun to take effect. The hand and arm were swelling, and before long Sajad was lying on the floor, writhing in agony. The only antidotes I had were ammonia and whiskey. Sajad knew the contents of both bottles, for he had the care of all my traps. I did my best for him with the ammonia; but utterly in vain I pleaded, begged, commanded that he take the whiskey. He would not touch it.

Why? Only because he was a Mussulman. No matter how intense his agony or determined my command, he put his left hand over his mouth and shook his head. He felt sure that he was dying, and he believed my assertion that the whiskey might save him, but that made no difference. He came so near death that he was past seeing anything and beyond hearing. He lay upon the ground, just breathing, panting, as though he was almost at the end. It seemed useless to try again, and yet, now that he was unconscious, I could at least make a last, desperate trial with the whiskey. The moment that it touched his lips, he struggled away, clutched his lips with his hand and shook his head.

I believe the very fear that I should succeed in giving him whiskey kept him alive till the poison began to lose its power. At all events, he did not die.

Sajad was as fond of hunting as I. Many a time we two slipped away from camp in the grey of early morning. Once, just before daylight, I was out with my shot-gun in a thinly-wooded jungle, a mile from camp, upon the shore of a small lake, waiting for birds.

It was just my luck. Because I came prepared for birds, there was not one in sight, but three beautiful antelopes came down to drink, within a hundred feet of us. I looked at the shot-gun in disgust; then looked again at the antelope. It was exasperating. I was determined to have a shot, at any rate, and, in the hope that I might stun one of them or at least bewilder him for an instant, I whispered to Sajad to be ready with his knife and make a dash the moment I fired.

Cautiously I raised the gun to my shoulder and was pressing the trigger, when Sajad touched me and whispered: "Wait, Sahib! Look there!"

I looked and my shot-gun fell. At a slight angle, but little more than half-way between us and the antelopes, there crouched a royal Bengal tiger. A single glance was sufficient. He was surely a man-eater. Evidently he had been on the point of satisfying his hunger with an antelope when he caught sight of us. He was within an easy leap of the antelope, but was deliberately turning away and facing us. The motion startled the deer and they bounded off, but the tiger paid them no further attention. The huge creature opened his great jaws till his head seemed nothing but a red, yawning gullet, bordered by long, ragged, glistening teeth, and, with a savage snarl, he began to approach us.

There was no need of looking about for a place of safety. The jungle was sparsely wooded at the best, and the largest tree we had passed in coming from camp would not have borne even Sajad's weight ten feet from the ground. Sajad had only his hunting knife; I nothing but my shot-gun.

"One of us must go, Sahib," Sajad muttered, without taking his eyes from the tiger. "If we run together, we shall both go; he will overtake us in a moment. Let Allah decide as it is written in our foreheads. Run that way, for your life, Sahib. I will run this way. Be quick! before he comes nearer!"

There was no time for thought. It seemed a fair proposition, and even as he spoke the Hindoo started at the top of his speed away. It was useless standing still or following him, and, acting upon his suggestion, I started in the opposite direction.

After running a rod or two, I looked over my shoulder. The tiger had made a leap and was just landing, already crouched for another spring. He was following me!

I will not admit that I hoped he would follow Sajad, but I did hope that he would not choose me. It amounted to the same thing.

I started on one more desperate struggle. I was doomed. I knew it perfectly well; yet while there is life there is hope, and I ran as I never ran before. I resolved to go as far as I could, and then whirl about and give the tiger a charge of fine shot full in the face. It might put out his eyes. There was at least that possibility to hang a desperate hope upon, and throwing my gun to my shoulder, I turned. The tiger was not there!

Looking farther back, I saw his tawny hide in the underbrush. Instantly it rose. He was making a leap, but it was not towards me! One thrill of gratitude shot through my veins, when my heart stood still with horror! There was one sharp yelp as the huge form swept through the air, and, crushing the leaves and branches as it fell, landed upon the prostrate form of Sajad, silently waiting for the blow.

I stood there petrified, the cold perspiration dripping from my forehead. There was not a sound from Sajad. There was only one fierce howl from the tiger. Then all was still.

It was only an instant, but in that instant we two, my Hindoo servant and I, stood out before me in very bold relief. I had run for my life, knowing that the chances lay between us two, and hoping, at least, that the tiger might not follow me. He had run, too, knowing that the chance lay between us, and because the tiger did not follow him he had come back again and tempted him—called him away from me, and given his life for mine.

He was a poor benighted heathen, and only an average sample of his kind. He could not help stealing pretty things. He could not help telling lies. But surely he was a truer, braver, nobler man than I, and if the image of God can be found, to-day, in any of His creatures, it would require no very deep theologian to decide which of us two betrayed it—least profaned.

MR. GRIFFITH'S LAST NEW NOVEL,

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

Now on sale at Pearson's Weekly offices, and at all leading booksellers and bookstalls.

In one handsome volume, 8vo, 375 pages, uniform with THE ANGEL OF THE REVOLUTION and OLGA ROMANOFF; OR, THE SYREN OF THE SKIES.

Digitized by Google

THE MYTH OF A MANIAC

FOR two weeks the Plunging Petrel, a big three-masted schooner, had ploughed its way through the placid waters of the Pacific with a sameness that was exasperating. Since leaving port, nothing—not even a threatened storm or a lively gale—had broken the monotony.

The ship was bound for Rio, Brazil, with a cargo of wheat, and I was her only passenger—seeking health in this manner, according to my physician's urgent request. She was commanded by a sturdy old navigator, Captain Collins, a man who on first acquaintance might appear to be cold, distant, and reserved, but who proved, in my case at least, to be exactly the opposite, for I soon found him a genial, hearty, good fellow. He was strict with his men, but not tyrannical, and he was a good story-teller.

But monotony was not to last us all through the voyage. There was soon a singular and ominous change.

One day, about noon, at the beginning of the third week, a sailor named Bates was placed in irons for striking a messmate with a marlinspike and breaking his arm. The punishment was undoubtedly deserved, but there were angry mutterings, and more than one sullen face among the crew in consequence, for Bates, whose only fault was an uncontrollable temper, was a general favourite. But when the unfortunate man was found dead the next morning things began to look black for the officers.

There was no sign of wound or struggle upon the body of the dead man, but the atmosphere of the forecastle where he had been confined was redolent with the fumes of chloroform. I called the captain's attention to this, but he thought I must be mistaken, and would not be convinced, even when the boatswain and one of the mates argued on my side. He declared that there was none of the drug on board, and never had been. And so it happened that poor Bates was buried in the deep sea, at the very hour at which he was to have been liberated.

At eight bells the following night, when the first-mate went on deck to relieve his fellow-officer, the latter had disappeared, and could not be found. I happened to be leaning against the mizzen-mast, smoking, when the alarm was given, and I could have sworn that I had been smelling chloroform for half-an-hour, although I did not call the fact to mind until the dreadful cry of "Man overboard!" was sounded and all hands piped on deck. A boat containing the first mate and four men was lowered at once, the ship was brought about, and two hours were spent in fruitless search. In the meantime every accessible nook in the ship, which was tacking backwards and forwards in the locality, was inspected with like results. At last the searching party was taken on board, and the ship resumed its course.

The captain now took turns at the watch with the mate, and everything ran smoothly till the following night, or rather the next morning—four bells of the first watch. Then, when he turned out to relieve the mate, that officer could not be found. The same efforts were made to find the missing man, and with the same result as on the previous night, and the captain was nearly frantic. He was not only deeply grieved at the death of his two officers, but greatly shocked and mystified at the strange manner of their disappearance.

On both occasions the water, apart from a heavy swell, was comparatively smooth, the wind only brisk enough to fill the sails, and the stars were shining. This, together with the fact that both the mates were known to be expert swimmers, so that they should, under ordinary circumstances, have been able to keep afloat for hours, deepened the mystery. The captain would not admit that the presence of chloroform, if it existed at all, had anything to do with the mystery.

On the afternoon following the second disappearance the captain called me into his cabin, shut and locked the door, and beckoned me to a chair at a small table. I saw nothing remarkable about this, believing that he only wished to talk over his troubles; but when he took a seat opposite me I noted that his face was deathly pale, and that his lips were tightly compressed.

"My two officers have been murdered, Mr. Vincent," he fairly gasped.

"Murdered!" I exclaimed. "I have suspected foul play from the first. Have you any evidence?"

"The best in the world. You have noticed the big Dane, Qvistgard?"

"That mild-looking fellow with the red beard?"

"Yes."

"Why, certainly; but you don't suspect him, I hope."

"Of course not. On the contrary, there is mutiny on foot, and he——. But here is a note he slipped into my hand a moment ago. Read it for yourself. Unless you and I and this faithful fellow can outfight or outwit fifteen villains we are doomed."

With a face that must have been as white as the face before me, and a hand that was anything but steady, I picked up a sheet of paper which the captain had thrown on the table, and read the following:—

"CAPTAIN,—I have discovered a horrible plot. All the crew except myself have mutinied. The mates were knocked on the head and thrown overboard. You will share the same fate when you come on deck to relieve the watch to-night, unless you heed this warning. Meet me ten minutes before the close of the second dog-watch, just aft the main hatchway, and I will tell you everything. In the meantime, do not speak to me or send for me, for we are closely watched. I am supposed to side with the crew. The least mistake would be fatal. Don't tell the passenger. He may be all right, but I doubt it. For God's sake, captain, don't go near the rail."

"Don't tell the passenger!" I muttered, as I looked at the captain, not only horror-stricken at the contents of the note, but surprised and hurt at the uncomplimentary reference to myself. But the captain, who must have divined my thoughts, relieved my mind on this point by saying:

"That's all right, my dear Vincent. The fellow is only a trifle over-cautious. Don't mind him. I would trust you with the ship, and my life too, for that matter. You see I have shown my confidence by allowing you to read the note. Now, I want your advice. Your assistance I shall count on without the asking when the time comes."

"Thank you, captain," I answered. "To start with, I should certainly not go on deck till it is time to meet the Dane, if I were you."

My companion had now regained his composure to a certain extent, and sat for a moment drumming the table with his fingers.

"Who has the watch now?" I continued presently.

"Hutton, the tall seaman with the red scar on the back of his hand," was the answer. "He is acting as first mate, and I had decided to give Jones, the little Welshman, the position of second to-morrow. Both are fairly good seamen, and, by all the gods, I can't understand it! I could have sworn that these two men were as true as the dead mates ever were, until I got this warning from Qvistgard. But he is right, my boy, he is right. All this comes from that unfortunate Bates affair. I wonder who is the leader? If he could be shot or placed in irons it might quell the others. Have you a pistol?"

"A small pocket affair," I answered.

"I have two large ones, and a repeating rifle in my chest," continued the captain. "How would it do to batten down the hatchway of the forecastle when part of the dogs are below at supper, and pump lead into the rest of them? I don't believe they are armed, unless they have a few knives. We could then make for the nearest port."

Digitized by Google

"Better wait till you see the Dane," I replied. "He may be able to give you the name of the leader."

For an hour or more we continued to plan, but without being able to decide on anything definite. At last it was agreed that I should go on deck, and see what could be learned there. In half an hour I returned, with anything but favourable news. The men were talking guardedly in groups, and when I passed near them they quickly dispersed. The big Dane was leaning over the rail near the log, silent, and apparently watching with absorbed attention the receding, foam-capped waves in the ship's wake.

Before sundown all our weapons had been oiled, examined, and loaded, the captain and myself secreting the revolvers about our persons, and leaving the rifle for the Dane.

The sky had clouded over late in the afternoon, and night, gloomy and foreboding, settled down on the schooner.

"The very elements seem to be in sympathy with this cursed business," said the captain, when it began to grow so dark in the cabin that we could hardly make out each other's faces; "and I feel as if the jig was about up with me."

As soon as the last streak of day had disappeared, the captain, revolver in hand, mounted the companion-ladder, and stole softly on deck. I followed him part of the way, but stopped, according to his directions, and stood with my head and shoulders above the companion-way, ready, in case of an emergency, to lend any assistance that might lie in my power.

I never looked into a blacker night. The air was soft and warm, and fitful gusts of wind dashed a few cooling rain-drops against my face, as I held my revolver and tried to keep the receding form of the captain in view. But he disappeared almost instantly, and, owing to the whistle of the wind in the rigging, the groaning of the masts and the creaking of the yard-arms, I could not hear his footsteps after he had gone half-a-dozen paces. He carried no lantern, but several lights glimmered fore and aft, dancing and shifting unsteadily about, like veritable will-o'-the-wisps. None, however, were near the main hatchway, the place of meeting.

Anxiously I waited five, ten, fifteen minutes, as nearly as I could reckon time, but neither sight nor sound brought intelligence of the captain. At last I could bear the suspense no longer, and I began to walk slowly along towards the bow.

When I thought I had reached the location of the hatchway, and was on the point of coming to a halt, I struck my foot against something and fell—the planks of the deck seeming to open and engulf me.

While still descending through space I realised what had happened—the hatchway had been opened, and I had fallen into the hole. A second later I found myself lying between two bags of wheat, more frightened than hurt, and with the fumes of chloroform almost suffocating me. Before trying to rise, I discovered that I was not in total darkness, and that a dim light came from somewhere, but not from above, I was sure. Presently a muffled groan reached me from the direction of the stern, and on looking over my shoulder I saw the stooping form of a man outlined by the rays of a lantern in front of him, about twenty feet away.

I gained my feet with some difficulty, and was about to step forward when the ship gave a lurch, and I was thrown lengthwise against the hull. Before I could stand up again, the bent form assumed an upright posture, and I recognised the big Dane. Muttering incoherently, he picked up the lantern, and started towards the place where I had first fallen, off to my left.

Whether it was fear, the shock caused by striking the hull, or the effects of the chloroform that kept me from trying to get up, I am not prepared to say, but I did not attempt to move hand or foot.

As the light drew near, I discovered a rope dangling from the deck. When the Dane drew near this rope, he deposited his lantern beside him, rubbed his big, hard hands together with a loud, rasping noise, and laughed a low, fiendish sort of chuckle, which fairly chilled my blood. A moment later, his merriment subsided, and, taking hold of the rope with one hand, he picked up the lantern with the other. I expected to see him run his arm through the handle of the lantern, and go, hand over hand, through the hatchway, but he was in no hurry, and began to talk in a harsh undertone:

"So far so good, King Qvistgard," he said. "A million pounds of diamonds, sewed up in sacks of silk, and all my own. Oh, what a royal present for my ebony princess! Fifteen days more and I shall reign supreme. The two mates and the captain are now my royal subjects, and to-morrow night the passenger will join them. Then come me hearties Hutton and the little Welshman; and so down the list. Ha! ha! ha! ha!"

Never until that awful moment had I heard the blood-curdling laugh of a maniac, but I recognised it as quickly as if I had passed all my days inside the walls of a madhouse. Before I knew it, my strength, or courage, or both, suddenly returned, and I arose cautiously to my feet, discovering, at the same time, the revolver, which had fallen from my hand when I stumbled on the deck. It was lying almost at the feet of the Dane. Advancing cautiously, I stooped, and was about to pick up the weapon; but before I could get hold of it the ship lurched again, I collided with the madman, and we both went down together.

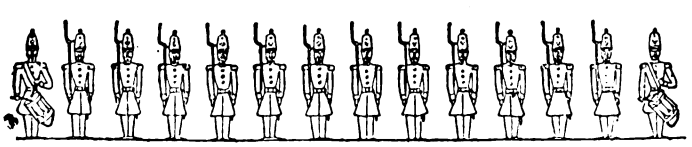
The revolver escaped me, the light in the lantern was extinguished, and there was a scream, a piercing cry of fright and anguish, such as only a terror-stricken madman can utter. And then, with that awful shriek ringing in my ears and the strong fingers of the demented Dane clutching my throat, I became insensible.

When consciousness returned I was lying in my berth; it was daylight, and Hutton was standing beside me. As soon as I was able to talk, he told me that just after dark, on the previous evening, a horrible cry was heard coming from the direction of the main hatchway, and that when the little Welshman and several other sailors rushed to the spot, the raving Dane was seen to climb up a rope from the hold. As soon as he gained the deck, he ran screaming to the rail and threw himself into the sea. I was found, more dead than alive, and taken to my cabin.

Soon after the captain and the two mates were discovered, gagged and bound near the spot where I had first seen the Dane. The captain recovered from the effects of the chloroform which had been administered to him, and was removed with the two officers, who were still alive, but too weak and exhausted to stand on their feet for many hours.

In two days all had recovered, and the Flying Petrel was manned and officered as before, save for the absence of Bates and the big Dane. All went well to the end of the voyage.

The mutiny was only a myth in the mind of the madman.



Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS' TREASURE.

Illustrated by MR. A. KEMP TEBBY.

SUMMARY.

The mail train has been robbed between Cornwall and La Grange stations, and £20,000 worth of gold stolen by a gang of desperadoes, headed by two brothers named Mulligan.

CHAPTER III.

THE SWAMP RETREAT.

THE robbers had worked without fear upon the train. Fully armed, and desperate as they were, they would not have hesitated a moment had it been crowded with men. They showed their courage when their leader, with two men, went on board at one of the previous stations, and remained, knowing to a certainty that the engine would be thrown from the rails, with the likelihood of dragging the whole train after it, and killing and maiming those within.

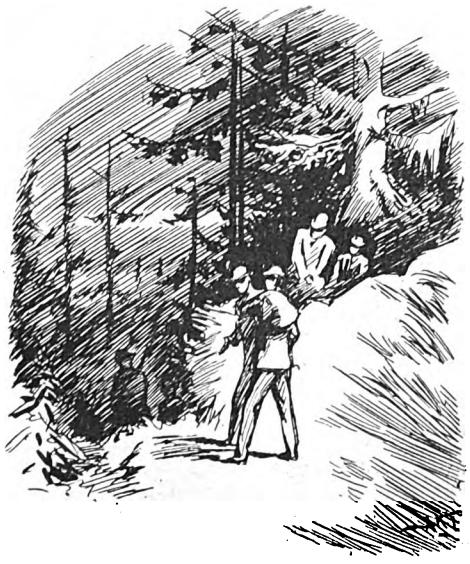
In the settlement of new countries, where the influx of the population is rapid, there is always sure to be an abnormal development of crime. The most desperate and abandoned are always drawn thither by the laxity of the legal power, and the abundant opportunity given for the commission of crime.

As an almost inevitable consequence, these men become emboldened by their immunity from arrest and punishment, and overstep the mark of prudence, until the community is aroused in self-defence, a vigilance committee is formed, and short and decisive work is the result.

The Mulligan brothers were two desperadoes, who, it was said, came originally from Texas, where, on account of their numerous crimes, they were compelled to flee the State; and when a man leaves that section of the Union for his misdemeanours, he may safely be set down as a phenomenon of villainy.

Gathering round them half-a-dozen men as desperate as themselves, they settled in one of the Western States, where they soon distinguished themselves for their disregard of all laws, both human and divine. They were engaged in bar-room brawls, in fights in the streets, murders and assassinations, until they became a perfect terror in the neighbourhood.

With the breaking out of the civil war between North and South they disappeared, and it was sincerely hoped that they would be killed in that terrible conflict; but the whole eight—after running no little personal risk—reappeared in the neighbourhood which they had left before, and renewed their outrages upon the community.



Glided away through the woods.

The authorities offered large rewards for their apprehension, and one or two men were rash enough to attempt to decoy some of them in the meshes of the law; but they failed, and were repaid by being shot down like dogs.

For convenience simply the outlaws settled in the central part of a vast marshy tract, which has been referred to elsewhere, where they made their home, and roamed over the country as they saw fit.

They had little or no fear of arrest in the community as it was organised at this time. Both Jim and Dick had openly jeered at the hand-bills which had posted them as outlaws, and emptied their revolvers after the officers of the law who had gone to the trouble of nailing up the notice.

But it was convenient for them to have a secure place of retreat, and they had chosen it well.

The form of an immense negro rose from the corner.

After the robbery they glided away through the woods like phantoms of the night. None of them had horses with them, and they stole as noiselessly and swiftly through the dark arches of the forest as so many Sioux Indians upon the trail of a foe.

They had gone but a few hundred yards when they reached the margin of Devil's Creek, at a place where it was about a hundred yards in width, and of considerable depth. There a long, narrow boat was awaiting them, and in an instant they were all within and seated. Two of them took up the oars, and the vessel progressed rapidly through the inky darkness, where it was impossible to see a foot in advance, and where their own presence was betrayed by the burning tips of their cigars.

Yet they were so well acquainted with the route that they advanced without hesitation through the blank gloom.

They laughed and chuckled over their success, and determined to indulge in a good spree for the unexpected good fortune that had attended their attempt.

A half mile up this stream, and they turned into a narrow tributary, which was ascended to about the same distance, when the stream broadened out into a sort of lake, in the centre of which was a small wooded island. Here their journey was at an end, and here they landed.

Passing about among the trees, they reached a sort of rude cabin, which had been erected years before, and which was large enough to contain them without crowding each other.

A light, burning dimly, was seen through the open window, and showed that someone was within, and Dick Mulligan, the moment he entered the door, shouted:

"Jubal! I say, Jubal!"

He waited a moment, but there was no response.

"Jubal! Confound your black hide, where are you?"

"Hello, dar!" came the response, in a voice so thick and obscured as to show that the individual was not yet fairly awake.

"Why don't you stir yourself when you know we are about? Come, you black dog, and 'tend to things!"

Digitized by Google

The form of an immense negro, somewhat bowed with age, arose from the corner, where he had slumbered upon the ground, stumbled forward, and threw additional fuel upon the fire, which, blazing up, displayed an apartment some twenty feet square, with a ladder communicating with the storey above.

A rough deal table was at one end of the room, while nearly a dozen chairs were scattered promiscuously about. In one corner was the rudest sort of cupboard, where a few dishes and cooking utensils were kept for the use of the negro, who prepared their meals, and acted as general servant to them all.

There was no stove in the room, a broad deep-throated fireplace answering for every such necessity.

The men were in high spirits to-night. They had captured over £20,000 in gold, to say nothing of the valuable jewellery, and there was an inclination upon the part of all to celebrate it in a manner that they judged befitting the occasion.

A huge demijohn of whiskey was brought forward by the African, and, with a number of tumblers, placed upon the table.

Then the carousal began. Drink after drink was swallowed until these men, who were hardened to such excesses, began to reel in their seats, and some fell to the floor.

The carousal began

Maudlin snatches of song, jests, and meaningless remarks were muttered and mumbled, until the eight men, who, a few hours before, cowed and held a whole train in subjection, and who, at that moment, were the terror of the neighbourhood for miles, were as helpless as so many invalid children.

Had a few police appeared on the scene at this juncture, or even had Fred Weldon stalked among them alone and unattended, short work could have been made with the desperadoes.

The negro was the only sober man in the party. When he saw all the others stretched helpless upon the floor, he carefully covered them with their overcoats and blankets, and then passed outside.

The night was dark, but during the last hour a faint moon had risen over the tree-tops, and there was the faintest illumination of the lake which inclosed the island where these desperate men had their homes.

"Dem yar fellers ar ob no 'count till to-morrow," he soliloquised, as he stood meditatively looking out upon the dark, silent water. "Dey's sometimes pretty ugly when dey're comin' out dar tantrums, and de best ting dis chile can do is to keep skearce."

He had been the slave of the Mulligan brothers in years gone by, and he had remained faithful by them, through all their adventures and villainies, up to the present moment, and, coward as he was, he was ready to risk his life for them at any moment.

"De night ain't bery cool, and p'raps I'd better stay out yah—sh! What dat?

A tremour of terror shook his frame as he heard the faint ripple of water near the other shore. Stooping down, he peered long and anxiously in the direction of the alarming sound, but he could discern nothing.

"It must have bin a fish——"

He paused abruptly, for at that moment he distinctly saw a small Indian canoe gliding noiselessly along the bank, propelled by a single man.

CHAPTER IV.

The Night Alarm.

When the express train halted at the La Grange station, and the score or two of passengers that had been waiting there stepped into it, the corpulent gentleman, who had given his name as Smith, walked down the Pullman, with valise in hand, and took his seat beside young Fred Weldon, of whom mention has already been made.

The first-mentioned personage, as we have intimated, was a noted detective, whose real name was Squirrek, and who had been engaged in some of the most famous cases of recent years.

The detective, as he now appeared in his spectacles, white cravat, his clerical suit of black, and the innocent questioning stare of his big blue eyes, had a certain Pickwickian look about him that would have induced a stranger to set him down as one of the most credulous and harmless of his kind.

Before taking his seat beside Fred Weldon, he inquired with great concern, whether the place was engaged, and being told that it was not, he sank down as gingerly as though he were doing a forbidden act.

As he did so he gave one sharp, sidelong glance at the handsome young man—a glance which told him as much as an hour's fixed stare would have done—and then, with the air of a nervous gentleman who wasn't often from home, made inquiries regarding the robbery, which was just then the subject of discussion through the entire train.

Fred answered his questions with a succinct courtesy that soon left little to be told. But when he had finished, and supposed the matter done, his portly companion appeared to consider the matter only just opened.

The innocent-looking man at his side plied him so skilfully that in the space of a few minutes he had extracted everything that the young man knew or had ever heard of the noted Mulligan brothers.

After this came a moment's silence, and then it was pleasantly broken by the portly gentleman, who next succeeded in winning from the young lawyer almost as much of his own personal history as he knew himself. It was done, too, in such a quiet insinuating manner that Fred could take no offence.

By the time the express began slacking up at the station of Somerville, a town of about two thousand inhabitants, where

Digitized by Google

He gave one sharp, sidelong glance.

the engine generally took in water, Fred Weldon began putting on his overcoat.

"Do you get out here?" inquired his new friend.

"Yes; this is where my mother lives. I am making her a short visit. You don't live here?"

"No, but I have to remain here a while—perhaps a week or so. I shall put up at the 'Drover's,' and if you have a spare evening, or an hour or so through the day on your hands, I shall be glad to see you."

Fred promised to continue their acquaintance, and, after bidding Mr. Smith good-night, the two separated, and took different directions; while the detective made his way to a hotel, the young man walked briskly down one of the bye streets, turning in at a small residence, which he entered with the manner of one who was perfectly at home.

So he was, for here lived his mother, the only relative he had in the world, and whose almost idolising affection he returned with an equally strong love.

A moment later, a handsome woman in middle life was clasped in his arms, and the son sat down to a meal which had been spread for him, and which had been waiting for the two hours that the express was behind time.

Fred explained that a slight detention, a sort of break-down, had delayed the train, but that none of the passengers had been hurt, and he was sorry that his mother had felt any uneasiness regarding him.

Fred Weldon had practised law in Brampton for two years, with a light heart and almost equally light purse. Young, enterprising, ambitious, handsome and talented, he toiled on, encouraged and discouraged, and with profound faith in the good day coming.

It cannot be said that he had nothing in the way of practice, for now and then clients did come to him, but they were not numerous by any means, and he had plenty of leisure for study and physical exercise.

He was the son of a physician, who had died when his child was quite young, leaving him enough to complete his collegiate course, and to afford a bare subsistence to his widow.

Believing there was a favourable opening at Brampton, some forty odd miles distant, Fred had started work there, and there he had toiled and hoped, and there he was toiling and hoping still.

But just now he was home for a short holiday; as he told his mother, he had arranged his business affairs so as to spend a week with her, and he told the truth when he added that he managed to do so with little difficulty to himself.

The chat was pleasant and affectionate, just as might have been expected between a mother and her only son, and at a comparatively early hour Fred withdrew to his room for the night. The next day was passed mainly at home, without seeing his friend Smith, but he was occupied until late in the evening in reading to his mother, and it was near midnight when he retired.

He had scarcely entered his bedroom, when, in the still night, he heard the gate pulled violently open, someone walked rapidly up the gravel path, stepped hurriedly to the door, and gave a ringing knock.

Mrs. Weldon was on the lower floor, and, before her son could anticipate her, she had unfastened the door, and saw before her the scared face of Jacob, one of the men-servants of Judge Woodland.

"Well, Jacob, what is the matter?"

"I am afraid something has gone wrong with the judge."

"What is it!"

"That's what I can't tell. I've come after Master Fred; the folks over at home are going distracted over it, and sent me out in search of some folks to go and hunt the judge up."

"Is he lost?" inquired Fred, who by this time had descended to the hall-door.

"I'm afraid he is. He went off to Millville this morning, and promised to be back by sunset, and he hasn't come yet."

"I don't see any occasion for alarm in that. Something may have happened to detain him."

"But the horse came tearing homeward a little while ago, all covered with froth and foam, with the harness flying about him, and with nothing of the trap at all. The women folk are sure the judge is killed. The old lady is weeping and wringing her hands, and as for Florence, she is about crazy."

"That is indeed serious," replied young Weldon, who had already begun donning his overcoat. "I will go with you; mother, good-night."

A hasty kiss was given and taken, and the two men hurried down the path and out into the road, and then up the street, and out in the country towards the residence of Judge Woodland.

"His horse has probably run away with him," Fred found time to remark as he ran along.

"No, he hasn't either," was the emphatic denial.

"How do you know that?" asked the young man, in considerable surprise.

"'Cause that yer mare never done such a thing with the Judge nor anyone else, and what's more, she wouldn't do it if she had a wild Indian a-driving of her."

"What, then, do you think was the matter?"

Fred repeated the question several times before the old man answered:

"I b'lieve it's them Mulligan brothers!"

"No—"

But the young lawyer paused abruptly as he recalled that Judge Woodland was a well-known opponent to the notorious band. He had managed to get one of them in his clutches, and had sentenced him to twenty years' imprisonment, but on his way he had escaped through the connivance of his guard, who were doubtless influenced by their fear of the desperadoes.

Furthermore, it was Judge Woodland who had been mainly instrumental in inducing such a large reward to be offered for the capture of the gang, having guaranteed one half of it himself.

All this flashed through the mind of Fred Weldon at the moment he had commenced to remonstrate with the declaration of the man, and he withheld further answer. He felt that there was a probability that the truth had been spoken.

"Only bring him back.

Judge Woodland, living but a short distance out of Somerville, probably felt secure against any personal danger from these ruffians, although it is not to be supposed that such a consideration would have influenced him in the discharge of his duty.

Digitized by Google

The headquarters of the outlaws was thirty or forty miles distant. While the two brothers themselves, and one or two others, were known to many of the police, yet the majority of the gang were shrewd enough to keep themselves strangers to those from whom there was any cause to fear danger.

Many of them, including the leaders, went about as they chose, sometimes going as far as Chicago and other large cities; but when they did so they were so thoroughly disguised, that it would have taken a keen-eyed detective to have suspected their identity.

But Judge Woodland was a marked man. He had received numerous warnings during the trial of one of the gang, all of which he treated with contemptuous indifference.

The horse of Fred Weldon suddenly shied.

But as week after week passed away without his seeing any of the gang, his alarmed family forgot their fears; and when, on this pleasant day in autumn, he started for a neighbouring village, there was not a word of warning uttered, and not a thought entered his head as his docile mare jogged along.

A few hundred yards, and Fred Weldon reached the residence. As he anticipated, he found the family in the greatest distress. Mrs. Woodland was wringing her hands, and was on the verge of hysterics, while Florence, more beautiful than ever in her woe, was hurrying back and forth, and doing what she could to assist the party of rescue, or rather of search, in making their preparations.

A hundred men could have been raised in the town, but they were not needed. Jacob had been sent in great haste to gather such as he thought fit, and he had selected three besides Fred Weldon—three strong, sturdy fellows, who had run with all despatch upon receiving the alarming tidings, and who were now mounted, and only awaiting the coming of the fourth man.

"Oh, Mr. Weldon, I am so glad you have come!" exclaimed Florence, as she seized his hand.

"This is, indeed, sad," said Fred; "but I hope it is not so bad as——"

"Oh, hurry—hurry! Only bring him back, and we will pray for you as long as we live."

A few moments later the four men cantered out on the road, and started in search of the missing Judge Woodland.

CHAPTER V.

THE WRONG MAN.

IT was beyond midnigh when the four horsemen took the road over which the affrighted mare of Judge Woodland had thundered home, and they spurred their animals to a swinging gallop, their whole minds and energies bent upon the work before them.

There was a full moon high up in the heavens, and they could see for a considerable distance ahead, so that it was hardly possible for them to pass any important object upon the way without seeing it.

The four were armed with revolvers, and every one of them was brave, and anxious to meet the men who had dared to offer any violence to Judge Woodland.

Fred Weldon recognised two of the men as old friends of his—one of them was a middle-aged blacksmith, a man noted for his activity, great strength, and personal prowess. He was remarkably skilful in the use of both the pistol and rifle, having won quite a name as a sharpshooter during the war.

The other was the son of the keeper of the "Drover's Hotel," who was rather dissipated at times, but who was quite an athlete, and had shown such proof of his skill and bravery that there were many disposed to overlook his failings, which at times were of a glaring nature. He was always ready to offer his services in the cause of right, no matter what parties were concerned, and he was the first man to whom Jacob hastened in his extremity.

But the third man was a stranger to Fred Weldon, and for a time he failed to make out who he was; but after they had got fairly upon the road, and he gained a view of his face, he was startled into an exclamation of surprise as he recognised in the large, heavy-set personage no less a character than the innocent-looking Mr. Smith, whom he had encountered in the express train a couple of nights before.

Scarcely a word was spoken among the party until they had ridden some distance, when the detective turned upon Weldon, having noticed his fixed looks for several minutes past.

"He is one of Dick Mulligan's men."

"You seem surprised to see me among your friends!" he remarked with a smile.

"Indeed I am; you are the last man I should have expected to see engaged in an expedition of this kind."

"I was smoking a quiet cigar with Tom here when the man came after him, and of course I couldn't let my friend go alone, and that's how I am here."

"You are aware," said Fred with some hesitation, "that there may be danger attending this?"

"Yes."

All, excepting Smith, had some theory to offer for the disappearance of Judge Woodland. The detective merely listened to the others, and held his peace.

The hour being so late, they encountered few people on the road. They were now following the turnpike, but after going a couple of miles they turned off into a branch road leading directly towards the village where Judge Woodland had been. During the few minutes that the three men had awaited the arrival of Fred Weldon, they had learned the direction by which the missing man always went to and came from his destination on this day. So there was no halting for conjecture as to the proper course to pursue.

Digitized by Google

"It is on this road that we'll learn something of the judge, if we learn it at all," remarked Tom Haldy, as they turned into it.

"I recollect it very well," replied Fred, "although it is a good many years since I have travelled over it."

"And I've a feeling that the murder has took place nigh to the Ten-Mile Woods," added Jim, the blacksmith, who sent a shudder over every member of the party by the mention of the word murder.

The Ten-Mile Woods were scarcely half of that in extent, having borne the name ever since the clearing off of the surrounding country, and they were now several miles ahead of the horseman.

"What sort of a forest is it?" inquired the detective.

"An ordinary tract of woods, extending for nearly five miles on both sides of the road."

"Is it known ever to have been the scene of any tragedy?"

"Not that I can recall——"

"Don't you remember the drover that was shot near the half-way house just before the war?" interrupted Tom.

"You are right—I had forgotten that."

"What was the circumstance?" inquired the detective, who allowed no opportunity to pass for gaining information.

"It is a story that is soon told," replied Haldy. "A drover was found shot near the half-way house, within twenty minutes after the pistol-shot had been fired. Father was riding by just after dark, and he found the poor fellow still alive, and able to describe the man who did it."

"Did he recognise the description?"

"Yes, it was old Balters, who kept the Half-way House, and, to satisfy himself, father stopped at the House, and took a drink and smoke with the old fellow, using his eyes as best he knew all the time. The result of it was that he learnt enough to satisfy himself that the old fellow was the assassin. He was arrested the next day, the crime was proved against him, and Judge Woodland sentenced him to be hanged, and he was hanged."

"What is this Half-way House?"

"A little dilapidated building standing near the middle of the woods. I have heard that it was built as a tavern, and old Balters used to keep a barrel of whiskey behind the counter, and generally had a stray bed for any traveller who came along."

"Did he live there alone?"

"No; he had a wife and son. The woman ran away with another man just before Balters committed the crime; and the boy, after vowing vengeance upon Judge Woodland for condemning his father to death, disappeared, and I have never heard of him since."

"Is the Half-way House occupied?"

"Not unless it has been taken quite recently."

Fred Weldon listened to this conversation, for it touched another chord which caused a new shiver of dread to run through him. Somewhere, he could not remember where, he had heard it said that young Balters was a member of the Mulligan gang; and only a night or two before, when the train was being robbed by them, he had noticed a stooping form which recalled this young villain.

By this time they had reached the edge of the Ten-Mile Woods, and the detective was busy plying his questions.

"Have either of you passed over this road recently?"

None of the three had.

"Do you know whether any attempt has ever been made upon Judge Woodland's life?"

"I have heard —— Hello! Yonder is somebody!"

Just as the horseman was entering the woods, they descried another horseman coming out. The latter appeared somewhat anxious to avoid them, but he could not very well do so, and so he put on as bold a face as possible, and rode forward. As he came up, he revealed the fact that he was a negro.

"Good ebenin', sah," he called out, anxious to conciliate the strangers.

"Who are you?"

"I's Pomp, and I works up at Massa Beckett's."

"What called you out so late?"

"I—I doesn't like to tell," faltered the African with a silly laugh.

"If you don't answer me at once I'll shoot you!" said the detective, in the fiercest voice he could assume.

"I's being to see Sally—a handsome young lady dat libes down at Gineral Jones', and dat I tuck——"

"Did you meet anyone on your way here?"

"Nobody at all. But oh, my golly, warn't dis chile skeerd!"

"Where? At what?" inquired the detective, as the four men gathered round him.

"Why, right down yonder!" replied the darkey, looking affrightedly behind him. "Down in dat holler. Oh, it was orful!"

"What was it?"

"I was ridin' long quiet-like, when I heard a groan, and I seed sumfin' lookin' like a man, and my hoss gave such a jump——"

The horsemen heard no more, but were dashing away at full speed through the woods, sure that the dead or dying body of Judge Woodland was close at hand.

Several hundred yards were passed in this manner, and then the horse of Fred Weldon suddenly pricked up his ears and gave a snort of alarm and shied to one side.

All four reined up, and the young lawyer at once dismounted.

"There is something here," he said to his companions. "Just keep an eye on my horse while I take a look round."

"Hush!" exclaimed Tom with a shiver. "I heard something like a groan. There, don't you hear it again?"

Every ear did hear something like the low moaning of a person in distress, and a shiver of apprehension ran through Fred as he walked softly towards the wood, with his eyes and ears alert.

"Do you see anything?" asked the detective.

"There he lies."

A dark form was seen stretched upon the ground by the roadside. The next moment the four men had dismounted, and while one quieted the frightened animals, the others hastened to the assistance of the dying man.

In a moment he was borne out where the moonlight could shine upon him. He was yet alive, but breathing with great difficulty.

"He is not dead!" said the detective.

"Good heavens! this is not Judge Woodland. We have the wrong man!" exclaimed Fred Weldon.

"Who is he?" asked Squirrek, equally puzzled.

"He is one of Dick Mulligan's men!" was the reply of the blacksmith.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

The Fountain of Youth

It was on the day of the summer solstice, and the glow of midday lay on the corn-fields. At times a fresh wind swept over from the mountain forest near; then the stalks bent low, and the poppies on the edge of the field scattered their delicate petals. Crickets and grasshoppers chirped in the grain, and from the blackthorn on the roadside the yellow-hammer once in a while let her gentle call be heard.

Through the corn-fields, which extended from the valley to the mountain, walked, in the narrow path, a young woman of slender yet strong figure. She wore the customary plaited skirt, and, for protection against the sun's rays, a red kerchief; on her left arm hung a basket, and in her right hand she carried a stone jug.

As the yellow-hammer in the thorn-hedge became aware of her presence he fluttered to the highest twig and called softly: "Maiden, maiden, how do you flourish?" But the bird was mistaken. The blonde Greta was a young wife, and now was on her way to her husband, who felled wood in the forest above.

When the fair one had reached the border of the forest she stood listening, and soon the strokes of a woodman's axe told her where to turn her steps. It was not long before she saw her husband, who felled a pine-tree with mighty strokes, and, with joyful voice, she called to him.

"Remain standing where thou art," responded he. "The tree will fall directly." And the pine-tree gave a deep sigh, bowed itself, and sank crashing to the earth.

Now Greta came nearer, and the sunburnt woodcutter took his young wife in his arms and kissed her fondly. Then she sat down on the trunk of the tree, and took the food from the basket she had brought. Here Hans laid down the bread, took his axe in his hands, and saying: "I have forgotten something," stepped in the direction of the fallen tree, and cut three crosses in the wood.

"Why dost thou that, Hans?" asked the wife.

"That was done on account of the wood sprites," explained the husband. "The poor creatures have a wicked enemy, who is the wild hunter. Day and night he waylays them and hunts them with his dogs. But if the pursued little women succeed in escaping to such a tree trunk, then the wild huntsman cannot harm them, because of the three crosses."

The young wife's eyes grew large.

"Hast thou ever met a wood sprite?" asked she, curious.

"No. They only rarely let themselves be seen. But to-day is the solstice, when they become visible."

And suddenly he called with a loud voice into the forest: "Wood sprite, appear!"

He had only done this in order to tease his wife; but, on the holy Midsummer-day, one should not jest about such things.

At once a little woman, three feet high, delicate of form and very beautiful of face, stood before the pair. She wore a long white garment, and in her golden hair a spray of mistletoe.

Hans and Greta were very much frightened. They rose hastily from their seats, and Greta made a bow, the best she could do.

"You have called me at a good time," said the wood sprite, and pointed with forefinger to the orb of the sun, that stood almost over her head, "and a good deed"—here the little woman pointed to the marked tree stump—"is the other reason. Gold and silver have I not to give away, but I know of something better. Come with me—it will do you no harm—and take your jug. You will be able to make use of it."

So she spoke and led the way. Hans shouldered his woodman's axe, Greta took up the stone jug, and both followed the little woman. She had a walk like a duck, and Greta plucked her husband's sleeve, pointed to the waddling little woman, and would have whispered something into his ear, but Hans laid his forefinger on her mouth. Nothing hurts a sprite more than to have a person ridicule her gait. They have feet like a duck, and, therefore, they wear long, flowing garments to protect them.

After a short time the three arrived at a clearing. Very old trees stood in a circle round the meadow; out of the grass arose lilies and bluebells, and great butterflies rested thereon, waving their wings to and fro. And Hans, who thought he knew the whole forest, could not remember to have crossed this place.

On the edge of the meadow stood a small house. The walls were covered with the bark of trees, and the roof was shingled with the scales of pine cones, and each scale was fastened down by a rose thorn. Here the wood sprite was at home.

She led her guests behind the house, and pointed to a spring whose water gushed silently from the black earth. Succulent colt's-foot and irises grew on its brink, and over its surface danced green and gold dragon flies.

"That is the fountain of youth," said the wood sprite. "A bath in its waters turns an old man into a boy and an old woman into a girl. But if one drinks the water, then does it ward off old age unto death. Fill your jug and carry it home. But be economical with this precious water; a drop used each Sunday is enough to keep you young. And yet again: As soon as thou, Hans, dost cast thy eye on a strange woman, or thou, Greta, on a strange man, then the water loses its virtue. That mark you. Now fill your jug, and fare you well."

So spoke the wood sprite, refusing the thanks of the lucky couple, and went into the house. Greta filled the jug with the water of youth, and then they hastened home as quickly as they could to their cottage.

Arrived at home, Hans poured the water into a bottle and sealed it with fir resin. "For the present," he remarked, "we do not find the water of youth necessary, and we can economise. The time will come, indeed, when we will need it." And then they placed the bottle in the cupboard where they kept their treasures: a couple of old coins, a chain on which hung a golden penny, and two silver spoons. But Greta took great care that the water lost not its virtue.

And how they did take themselves in hand! When the young forester went by the garden before the house and exchanged a greeting with Greta, as indeed had been his custom, then Greta looked not up from her vegetable bed. And when Hans sat in the evening in "The White Stag," and the pretty Lisi brought him wine, then he made a face like a cat during a storm; and finally he did not go any more to the inn, but remained at home with his wife. Thus the water must certainly retain its magic power.

So there passed for the young couple a year of love and happiness, when to the two came a third. In the cradle a chubby boy kicked and cried, so that the father's heart leapt for joy. "Now," thought he, "is the time for us to open the bottle. What thinkest thou, Greta? A drop of the water of youth would do thee good."

The wife agreed to the proposition, and Hans went into the room where the magic potion was preserved. With hands trembling with joy he loosened the cork and—Oh, woe, woe!—the bottle slipped from his hands, and the water of youth poured over the floor. He came near falling to the floor, he was so frightened over the misfortune. What was he to do now? His wife must on no account learn what had happened; she might die from fright.

Perhaps he could tell her later what he had done; perhaps, also, he might find the fountain of youth again (which he had certainly sought in vain), and he might replace the loss. He hastily filled a new bottle, which was just like the first, with well water; and well water it was also that he gave his wife.

Digitized by Google

"Ah, how it refreshes and strengthens one!" said Greta; "take a drop also, dear Hans."

And Hans obeyed and praised the virtue of the magic potion, and from that time each one took a drop every Sunday when the church bell was ringing. And Greta bloomed like a rose, and Hans' veins swelled with health and strength. But he postponed the confession of his deed from day to day, for he hoped in his heart to yet find the water of youth; but roam through the forest as he would, he could not discover the meadow where the wood sprite lived.

Thus passed some years. A small maiden joined the little boy, and Frau Greta's once round chin had become double. She herself certainly saw it not, for the mirror was not yet in existence in those days. Hans saw it, indeed, but avoided speaking of it, and redoubled his love for his portly wife.

Then there happened a misfortune. At least Greta held it to be such. As she swept the house one day the small Peter, her eldest, came upon the cupboard in which stood the bottle with the supposed water of youth and clumsily overthrew the bottle, so that it broke and the contents were spilled.

"Oh, thou gracious Heaven!" lamented the mother. "It is lucky, though, that Hans is not at home." With trembling hands she gathered up the fragments from the floor and replaced the bottle by another, which she filled with ordinary water. "Certainly the deception will soon be found out, for now it is all over with the everlasting youth. Alas, alas!" But for the present she did not wish to tell her husband.

Again considerable time passed, and the couple lived together as on the day when the priest had joined their hands in marriage.

Each one carefully avoided letting the other know that youth was past, and each Sunday conscientiously took the magic drop.

Then it happened that one morning a grey hair remained between Hans' fingers as he combed his hair. And he thought: "Now is the time for me to tell the truth to my wife." With a heavy heart, he began: "Greta, it seems to me that our water of youth has lost its strength. Look there! I have found a grey hair. I am getting old."

Greta was frightened, but composed herself, and, forcing a loud laugh, cried, "A grey hair! When I was a little girl, ten years old, I had even then a grey lock amid my hair. The like has frequently happened."

After that, it happened in the autumn, as Hans with his family was eating a Michaelmas goose, that Frau Greta broke a tooth. There was great lamenting, for she was so proud of her white teeth.

And when the couple were alone together, the wife said in an unsteady voice:

"This misfortune would not have occurred if the water——"

But at this Hans blurted out:

"You think the water is good for everything. Has it not often happened before that a child has broken a tooth by cracking a nut? What hast thou against the excellent water? Art thou not fresh and sound as a rose? Or, perhaps, thou hast turned thine eyes upon another that thou mistrustest the virtue of the water?"

Then the wife laughed, wiped the tears from her cheeks, and kissed her husband so that the breath almost left him. But, in the afternoon, when they sat on the stone bench before the house door and sang two-part songs about true love, the passers-by said, "The silly old people!" However, the happy ones heard them not.

So passed many years. The house had become too small for the children. They had gone forth, had married, and had children of their own. The two old people were again alone, and were as dear to each other as on their wedding day; and every Sunday, when the church bells rang, each drank a drop from the flask.

Then once again the day of the summer solstice drew near. On the evening before, Hans and Greta sat before their door and looked towards the heights where the St. John's fire blazed, and from the distance sounded the mirth of the young fellows and maids, who stirred the fire and sprang through its flames in couples.

Then the wife said, "Dear Hans, I would like to go once more to the forest. If thou desirest it also, then will we start early in the morning. But thou must waken me early, for when the elder blossoms the young women like to sleep until the sun is high in the heavens."

Hans agreed. On the next morning he wakened his wife, and they went together into the forest. They walked like lovers, and each gave a careful heed to the steps of the other.

When Hans cautiously jumped over the root of a tree, the wife said, "Ah, Hans, thou leapest indeed like a young kid!" and when Greta timidly stepped over a little ditch, her husband laughed and cried, "Tuck up your dress, Greta! Jump!" And then they selected an old pine-tree, feasting in its shade on what Greta had brought with her.

"It was here," said Hans, "where the wood sprite appeared to us that day, and there yonder must lie the forest meadow with the fountain of youth. But I have never again found the meadow and the spring."

"And, Heaven be thanked! that has mattered not," hastily interrupted Greta. "For our flask is still far from being empty."

"Certainly, certainly," nodded Hans. "But yet it would please me if we could see the good wood sprite once again, and thank her for our good fortune. Come—let us go and seek her. Perhaps I will be as lucky to-day as formerly."

Then they set out and went deeper into the forest, and after a quarter of an hour saw there, before their eyes, the sunny forest meadow. Lilies and bluebells bloomed in the grass, gay-coloured butterflies flew to and fro, and on the edge of the forest stood also the little house, just as in years before. They went towards the house with beating hearts, and, best of all, there was indeed the fountain of youth at hand, and dragon flies, in green and gold, hovered over it.

Hans and Greta stepped to the brim of the spring. They embraced each other and stooped over the water; and from out the clear surface of the spring there confronted them two grey heads, with friendly, wrinkled faces.

Then hot tears fell from the eyes of the old couple, and they stood stammering and sobbing in mutual guilt. It required a long time before it became clear to them that each had deluded and for long years had lovingly deceived the other.

"Thou hast also known that we have both grown old?" cried out Hans joyfully.

"Of course, of course," laughed the wife, amid tears.

"And I, also," rejoiced Hans. Then he took his wife and kissed her as on the day she had said "Yes" to him.

Then the forest sprite suddenly stood before them, as if she had sprung out of the earth.

"Welcome," said she. "You have not appeared before me for a long time. But——but," continued the little woman, and threatened with her finger, "you have kept a bad home with the water of youth. Wrinkles and grey hair! Ah, ah! Now," continued she again, "that is easy to remedy, and you are come at a good hour. Quick! Spring into the fountain of youth; it is not deep; dip your grey heads under; then you shall see a miracle. The bath will restore to you youthful vigour and beauty. But quick, before the sun sinks!"

Hans and Greta looked at each other. "Wilt thou?" asked the husband, in an uncertain voice.

"Never," answered Greta quickly. "Oh, if thou only knowest how happy I am, that at least I may be old! And, also, it would be impossible on account of our children and grandchildren. No, gracious forest sprite, a thousand thanks for your good deed, but we remain as we are. Is it not so, Hans?"

"Yes," nodded Hans, "we remain old. If thou couldst but know, Greta, how well thy grey hair becomes thee."

"As you will," said the wood sprite, a little vexed. "There is no ceremony here." So speaking, she went into the house and locked the door behind her.

But the old couple kissed each other anew. Then they stepped homeward, arm in arm, through the forest, and the midsummer sun shed a golden light upon their grey heads.

Digitized by Google

THE FATAL RING

THE Abbé, Dr. Martel, and Besson sat together round the fire at the end of the large room filled with guests. The Abbé was speaking:

"Ah!" said he, "how many inconvenient people do you suppose are every year quietly got rid of by very simple means, which do not even occasion a suspicion in the mind of the family physician, not to mention the coroner, for he never sees the body? Our friend here will tell you that there are several drugs—aconitine, for example, the toxic principle of aconite—the minutest drop of which produces instant death and leaves no trace behind.

"Suppose some one, say, of these correct gentlemen here to-night is in debt and desires the inheritance of his elder brother, who perhaps is epileptic or a paralytic, whose misery it would really be charitable to end. Monsieur, the youngest brother, wears a beautiful ring—which is even more valuable than it looks, for on touching a secret spring the stone slides aside and reveals a minute vial, containing a drop of colourless fluid. This is aconitine, mes amis. A portion of it is injected by means of a small hypodermic syringe into the scalp, say, under the hair—et voilà; all is over. Martel here arrives, views the body, looks wise, and writes a certificate of death from heart failure! Later, perhaps, the murderer confesses to me, and I keep the secret with him. But you, Monsieur le Prefect, are left out of the affair! You never even heard of the man's death, unless perchance there be some legal question of inheritance to settle.

"Now," went on the priest thoughtfully, "without breaking that seal of confession, I can tell you one story of many which illustrates what I have been saying.

"It happened forty years and more ago, when I had barely entered upon my duties as curé of a small country parish. In fact, he was my first penitent.

"I can see him now, as he rushed into my little garden, where, one exquisite June evening, I was watering my roses. His boyish face was white, his yellow hair hung in damp locks to his temples, he was splashed to the waist with mud. On the thumb of the hand which held his riding-whip gleamed a great blood-red ruby set in an antique ring.

"He made me understand finally that he had something to tell me, and insisted that I should take him into the little chapel, 'where we should be safe.' Then he poured out his wretched story, telling that he had chosen to come to me 'because I, too, was young and of good blood, and would understand him.'

"He had married six months before, without the knowledge of his family, a burlesque actress of considerable beauty but doubtful reputation. At the time of his marriage, however, the boy, in his blind passion, had believed her a much-abused woman, and a good one. Tiring of pretence, she undeceived him soon after the wedding day. And then, as he could not provide enough money to keep her in luxury, she gave him notice that she should return to Paris and to her old vocation and her old life of dissipation. And, enraged by his reproaches, she further announced her intention of using in her profession the ancient and honoured name which he had given her. Mad with shame, the young man remembered the poison in his ring, a fancy of his freakish student days, and used it to avert the threatened disgrace. 'It would have killed my mother!' he said with a sob. A certificate of death from heart disease was given by the local physician, and by this time the woman had been in her grave a week.

"At the time of committing the crime, the lieutenant said, he had felt perfectly justified in it, and therefore calm; but, as I pointed out to him, the passion of anger had nevertheless blinded him. Asked whether he had slain the woman that she might be withheld from further sin, or in order to shield his own pride, he admitted that the latter was the true reason, but still declared that he could not have done otherwise. Indeed, he was not even now repentant, only disturbed and miserable. What could I say? I exhorted him to repent, and commanded him always to wear the fatal ring, as a perpetual reminder of his crime.

"I never saw him again. He sold out of the army, and, I think, left France; though I did hear a faint rumour some time afterwards that he had married again, a rich demoiselle of noble family, and had taken the name of her estate."

The Abbé's last words were interrupted by the butler's long-expected announcement:

"Monsieur le Comte de Brignolles."

A universal sigh and murmur of relief softly heralded the new arrival; the hostess went eagerly forward. A loud voice broke out, drowning her reproachful questions.

"Absolutely desolated, Madame my cousin, but believe me, it was not my fault! I have been in the house fully ten minutes. You see, the carriage broke down in one of your abominable mud-holes about a mile from here, and I was fain to bestride one of the horses and make the best of my way onward. I arrived somewhat dishevelled and muddy, as you may imagine, and so was forced to delay presenting myself for a few moments——"

Smilingly cutting short this voluble greeting, the hostess hastily presented the Count—a stout, blonde, florid gentleman, faultlessly attired—to her guests, and then the procession, forming in accordance with previous instructions, moved out across the wide hall into the dining-room, glowing with shaded light and soft colour.

The Abbé was separated from his two comrades by the whole length of the table. He sat at the hostess's left hand, and opposite him, on Madame's right, sat the Comte de Brignolles.

Dinner was scarcely on its way, the Abbé paying silent attention to his plate, yet somehow not duly appreciating its contents of oysters, alive only the instant before, when the Count leant forward, and remarked confidentially over a silver épergne of roses:

"I know now why your face seems familiar, father. I remember you perfectly, for I never forget a face—only you were not an Abbé then!"

You would have thought that the dignified prelate had been the culprit—he grew red and white almost as though he could have foreseen the next words.

"My cousin," said the Count, raising his voice, and glancing genially round the table, "I have been fortunate enough to meet at your table to-night a friend of my youth—my reckless youth, of which you have doubtless heard so many sad stories! In fact I was the first penitent of Monsieur the Abbé here—and I promise you I made him a confession that astonished him!"

The Count laughed loudly and emptied his glass of white wine. The soft buzz of talk began again, and the Abbé was thankful, for it drowned his incoherent reply. His neighbours found him unusually silent throughout the meal. In fact, the reverend father was completely dazed by this freak of fate.

He knew that his two friends—whose eyes he carefully avoided—were absolutely to be trusted; but he writhed, as though the hum of voices there seemed to penetrate Martel's suggestive cough and Besson's malicious chuckle. He knew also that they would already have ascertained that the ruby ring no longer ornamented the Count's thumb—it was one more thorn in his self-complacency.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

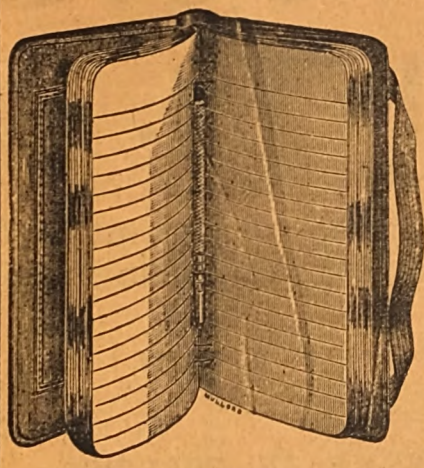
Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

COLLINS'

"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK,

WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST AND THE BEST.
THE SIMPLEST AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register" the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,

Bridewell Place, London, E.C.; 139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S
MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

FOR THE SMALL SUM OF 6s. 6d. WE WILL SEND AS FOLLOWS:—

NOT A TOY.

We give you A WATCH.

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.

FOR 6s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsome

KEYLESS WATCHES,

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

"Lowick-by-Beale, Northumberland, August 17.

"GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.

"Very truly yours,
"WILLIAM McISAAC."

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

"11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

"GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.

"I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,
"LEWIS C. RHODES."

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation. Money returned if not as represented.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call, or send to-day for the

6s. 6d. MONSTER PRESENTATION PARCEL INCLUDING THE HANDSOME KEYLESS WATCH.

S. S. GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

STORIES OF ALL SORTS FOR ALL PEOPLE.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 340. FOR WEEK ENDING JULY 6, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

Enquire at

SINGER'S

ABOUT

Presentation

OF

FIVE THOUSAND 5/- ART SETS

For Executing ART NEEDLEWORK similar to that on view at SINGER'S numerous Show Rooms.

Can be Learned Easily.

Can be Worked Cheaply by a New Process.

Our New Machine does both Plain Sewing and Art Work.

INSTRUCTION FREE.

THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY,

CITY SHOW ROOMS: 147, CHEAPSIDE, E.C.

Branch Offices Everywhere.

GOOD AND LASTING EMPLOYMENT TO INDUSTRIOUS MEN WHETHER EXPERIENCED OR NOT.

Digitized by Google

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,
E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.
Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE
All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES

Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science: they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

ONE BOX OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED
HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS
will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.
To whiten the hands and skin, use
Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.
1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.
S. HARVEY, Balham Hill, London, S.W.
Beware of injurious imitations.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.
Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(really genuine)

in patent air-tight tins—½lb., 1s. 2d.; 1 lb., 2s.; 2 lbs., 3s. 9d., including tin and postage.

Mrs. CONYERS,
Kilkhampton, Shalton, N. Devon.

HAIR DESTROYED

Root and Branch absolutely exterminated without injury to the skin, entirely new treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

RUPTURE CURED

WITHOUT OPERATION, S. J. Sherman, Hernia Specialist, 64, Chancery Lane, London; 26, King Street, Manchester; now sends his new Book of full information, post free, 7d.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to MRS. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

BLUSHING.

Permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, (Rooms O), Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

ECZEMA

and Skin Diseases of all kinds can be cured at once if you

Use "ANTEXEMA."

This is sold by all Chemists and Drug Stores, or may be had post free for 1s 8d., 2s. 9d., or 4s. 9d., of the ANTEXEMA Co., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W.—Drop a post-card to us, mentioning this paper, and we will send you, post free, a Little Book, containing valuable information about Skin Diseases of all kinds.

TO INVENTORS.

An Invention Protected for £1. Handbook, "How to Patent an Invention," giving full particulars, forms, &c., free from HUGHES & YOUNG, "Patent Editors" to the principal newspapers, 23, Coleman Street, London, E.C. Established 1829. INVENTORS ASSISTED IN WORKING OR SELLING INVENTIONS. Read "Patents."

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.
JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

New Harrison. SWIFT GOLD MEDAL.

KNITTER

KNITS STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" & "SUN" Machines.
HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticisms, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 340.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 6, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

The Enchanted Necklace

My father was an officer in the British army, my mother an Italian lady. The latter dying a few months after my birth, and my father's regiment being about the same time ordered off to India, I was taken in charge by my paternal grandmother, living on her estate in Somersetshire. In this sheltered seclusion I remained for eighteen years, when my grandmother died suddenly of heart disease, and I was sent out to India under the care of a minister's wife who had been home on a visit.

I was a slip of a girl, with a paucity of worldly experience which made me appear pathetically childlike. Physically and mentally I had been about equally endowed by both parents, and, in consequence, was made up of strange contradictions and startling contrasts. My golden-brown hair and fair complexion inherited from my father accentuated my classic features and large, dark eyes, which came from my mother; while my impulsive, warm-hearted Italian temperament was modified by a thin stratum of English reserve, making my moods as variable as the wind, which bloweth where it listeth. They gave to my manners a hint of fickleness, more apparent than real.

I had never seen my father nor his family, and felt fully what I was, a stranger in a strange land, my heart torn and bleeding from the wrench given it at parting from all I knew or loved. I stood on deck like one spell-bound, when I felt myself encircled by a pair of strong arms, while a deep, sonorous voice was saying in my ear: "My daughter, welcome to India," and, swinging round, I beheld my father, a middle-aged, soldierly man, with iron-grey side-whiskers and a sun-tanned visage.

He conducted me to his victoria (the only familiar-looking object I saw, and even this had native coachman and footman), and we were bowled rapidly along the smooth streets, whose quaint scenes with kaleidoscopic change flashed past us, out into the suburbs, along a line of Parsee residences, with their white walls and brilliant flower-beds, up on Malabar Hill, where my father's bungalow sat in a grove of tamarind trees, some distance from the road.

On the low, vine-draped verandah stood my step-mother, with her children, waiting to welcome me. She was a washed-out looking little woman, indolent and amiable, evidently a victim to the enervating climate, and her three children—all girls, and aged respectively nine, six, and three—bore a striking resemblance to her.

Her greeting was not lacking in cordiality, but the little ones drew back in round-eyed wonder, regarding me as though I were some strange animal. The look on their faces brought a sob to my throat, and oppressed me with a feeling of intrusion and superfluity. It seemed impossible for me to take the stamp of my new environments, and adjust myself to an insignificant rôle—I, who had been all my life the central figure and spoiled darling of my grandmother's household.

We were playing with her three Persian kittens.

I lived exclusively on fruits and boiled eggs—for palate and stomach alike rebelled at the curried dishes which at first I vainly essayed to eat, with the tears streaming down my cheeks to the no small amusement of the children, and disgust of the servants, who regarded as a personal insult my inability to appreciate the native cuisine.

From the soft-voiced ayah, who had charge of the nursery, down, through the different grades, to the old punkah-puller, squatting all day in the basement, and jerking the cord which kept in motion the fans about the house, I was made to feel an alien.

Like the Queen of Sheba before King Solomon, there was no more spirit in me.

"Send me a cobra stone by Bentley. He is ill, and is coming home on furlough," my school chum, Caroline Rochester, had said as she kissed me good-bye at parting.

Bentley was her brother—a captain in the cavalry. On the third day after my arrival I was sitting on the matting-covered floor of the library with Dorothea, the youngest child, who evinced a growing fondness for me. We were playing with her three Persian kittens, curled up on my lap like fluffy white pompons, when Captain Rochester was announced.

He was six-and-twenty (I had learned this from Caroline), tall and slender, with languid, thoroughbred, nonchalant manners, very white teeth, a blonde moustache, chestnut hair, and earnest grey eyes, fringed with dark lashes; but he was too emaciated to be even moderately good-looking.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

Pausing often to inspect the novelties.

I suppose it was our unconventional introduction and his relationship to Caroline that took away the constraint of a first meeting. Besides, he had been in India but a few months, and his easy reference to people and places that I knew was like balm to my aching heart. I was soon babbling to him with the familiarity of an old acquaintance, while Dorothea and the kittens climbed about over our knees. "Have you ever taken the walk through the woods to the beach?" he asked, when he had exhausted home topics.

"No," I replied, all my discontent surging back, "I have never left the house since I entered it. I am afraid."

"Afraid? Why, what are you afraid of?" he queried, with an amused look on his face.

"Tigers, and lions, and snakes, and—and—everything." The ready tears sprang to my eyes as I continued hotly: "Oh, I hate this country! I shall never, never feel at home here!"

"What a child you are—not much older than Dolly," he said, softly, as he leant over to pull her tip-tilted nose. "Why, there's no more danger of wild animals in this part of India than there is in England—a few snakes, perhaps, but they are timid and keep out of the way. You will feel differently when the strangeness of it all wears off." Pressing my hand encouragingly as he rose to go, he added, "But you must get out, where you will see many things to divert you."

In compliance with Captain Rochester's suggestion, I asked permission of my stepmother to drive into the city the next day shopping. She readily consented upon condition that I would excuse her from going, and take the ayah and Dorothea instead, adding as an afterthought, that I must be careful to avoid exposure to the sun, as it would be apt to bring on fever.

As soon as tiffin was over, we started. The top of the victoria was thrown back, for the sun shone fitfully, and clouds looming up from the ocean horizon portended rain.

We drove through the copper bazaar, but when we came to the flight of stone steps, leading down to the ancient town, we abandoned the carriage and proceeded on foot, pausing often to inspect the novelties that met us at every turn.

Just as we left a Chinese shop with its, pervasive odours, and were shaking our heads discouragingly at the almond-eyed Celestial standing bowing before us, and repeating persuasively: "Wantee anytling aday?" a sudden shower poured down. We scurried into the next door, where copper and brass vases, jars, and bowls were piled in artistic confusion.

Hearing a laughing ejaculation, I looked round, and my heart gave a leap which sent the blood to my neck and face, as I saw Captain Rochester standing in the room shaking the rain-drops from his hat. "I learnt from your gari-mala that you were in the town, and just caught a glimpse of you as you vanished in here," he explained, taking my hand, and kissing Dorothea.

Just then, remembering Caroline's request for a cobra stone, I asked our host if he could supply one. He hobbled to his feet with an alacrity which I should have thought impossible to one of his cumbersome dignity, and disappeared into an inner room. Hastily returning, he placed before me a small lacquer box, and with folded arms stood watching me keenly. But the ayah had thrown herself on her knees at my side, and with rolling eyes and trembling voice implored, "Don't buy them Missus, don't buy 'em. They devil-stones, an' bring bad luck," and she tried to take the box from me.

"They will not harm me. I am not superstitious," I said, defiantly, shaking off her detaining hand, and, opening the lid, I saw several small, yellow, semi-transparent pebbles, oval in shape, with flattened sides, lying imbedded in a nest of cotton.

"Is it true that the cobra de capello carries these stones in its mouth?" I asked of Captain Rochester, who was teasing Dollie.

"Yes," he replied, as he picked up the largest stone, and, turning it idly in his hand, continued, dreamily, "if tested by psychomancy, what tales of horror these innocent-looking pebbles might reveal of the jungle and death." He laughingly placed it against my brow, at which the ayah uttered a piercing shriek, and, seizing Dorothea in her arms, rushed to the door, and even I drew back with a feeling of awe. Recovering myself by an effort I pushed the box out of reach and persisted, deeply interested: "Tell me all about them. Of what use are they to the snake?"

"The most rational theory, I think," he said, absently twirling his moustache, "is that the cobras use them as decoys. The stone is a rare variety of fluor-spar, found in dry river-beds. It emits in the dark—especially when previously warmed—a greenish, phosphorescent light. Now the cobra has a peculiar fondness for a diet of fire-flies, and by coiling itself in the grass with the najá-kallu near, the fire-flies swarm round it in numbers, being easily deceived by its resemblance to the glow-worm, which, you know, is the female of the fire-fly, but crawls upon the ground, having only rudimentary wings. In this way the cobra obtains an easy supply of food, and will defend the stone with its life."

"But why is the ayah so afraid of them?" I asked, looking to where she stood with an ashen face, muttering rapidly to herself in Hindustanee.

"Oh, the natives have a superstition that their light comes from the spirit of those the cobra has killed, and that it grows dim if not supplied with fresh victims, which is an easy task, since there is no known antidote to the bite of the cobra."

"What a dreadful country to live in!" I said with a shudder, as he extended his hand to assist me to my feet.

I paid thirty rupees for three of the largest stones, and we crossed the street to a jeweller's, who agreed to polish and attach them as pendants to a delicate filigree necklace of silver, which I selected.

The sun was setting when we reached the victoria, and Captain Rochester, taking the seat at my side, with Dorothea on his knee, ordered the gari-mala to drive to the fort, that we might hear the band play. My eyes welled over with tears when the soft strains of "Annie Laurie" throbbed and swelled on the pulsing air.

Digitized by Google

"This looks like a bad case of home-sickness," said Captain Rochester, with sympathetic inflections of voice, as he laid his hand an instant tenderly over mine, behind Dollie's little plump back, and out of range of the ayah's sharp eyes, and, though my tears continued to flow, I do not think they were those of sadness. At the park gate Captain Rochester mounted his horse, which the groom was leading, and rode back to the city.

The following day the necklace was delivered, and I was fascinated with its quaintness. Half-an-hour before dinner I clasped it about my neck, and went into the library to write to Caroline an account of it. My father sat reading his paper, while Mildred, the second child, played with her blocks on the floor. From some indefinable cause, I suddenly raised my eyes, and found my father intently regarding me.

"Your mother was a very beautiful woman, my dear, and you are strikingly like her," he said feelingly. "Won't you come and sit by me?" There was an expression on his face which I had never seen before, and his eyes were full of retrospection.

"Ah, first love is strongest and best after all," sang my happy heart, as I hastened to him; but Mildred, pert and officious as usual, anticipated me by throwing herself in his arms, and, while she motioned me away, showered kisses on his face, crying:

"He is my papa! He is my papa!"

I returned to the desk—my father resumed his paper and mask of reserve, and never again was it lifted between us. After dark we sat on the gallery, when the najá-kallu, warmed by my neck, gave forth a lovely light, which terrified the servants, who all shared the ayah's belief in its sinister omen.

When I went to my room, I laid the necklace on my dressing-table and stood threading my white fingers through the meshes of my golden hair, as I gazed at myself in the mirror, with my father's words in my mind. Perhaps I was really beautiful. It seemed to me that I looked different from the girl I had been in England. A new feeling had certainly come over me, but I did not wish nor attempt to analyse it. That night my sleep was fitful and disturbed, and half-waking, half-dreaming, I heard gliding noises about my room, with the faint, resonant click of metal. When the ayah came in the morning to bring my little cup of black Mocha coffee, she found me up and dressed, instead of asleep as usual.

I did not think of my necklace until after breakfast, and then when I went to look for it, it was nowhere to be found. Sadi, the young Hindoo man who did the chamber-work, when questioned, denied most earnestly having seen it, which, however, failed to convince the consarmi of his innocence, judging from the sound of blows and yells, which afterwards proceeded from the stable-yard. My father employed a native detective, who assured him that the necklace would be restored in a short time.

Three weeks had waxed and waned since I reached India, and during the time I had seen Captain Rochester almost daily. But the easy familiarity of our intercourse was succeeded by a certain constraint, which jarred like a discord; and often, when I suddenly raised my eyes, I found his fixed upon me with melancholy intentness. For four days his visits had been discontinued altogether, without any assignable cause, and I grew restless and miserable. Next week he would leave for England, and might bring back a wife on his return. I was too much of a child, too undisciplined, to dissemble. When I was hurt I cried out like any other savage.

In a heedless, desultory way I strolled through the park out into the dusty road. How funereal the passing black-topped shegrams! How suffocating the air! I hurried on towards the beach, when, turning a sharp curve, where the road hugged the bank, as though dizzy at the precipitous depths below, I saw Captain Rochester coming towards me, his head bent down, and flicking the pebbles out of his path with a small cane. Returning health was transforming him into a remarkably handsome man. He had not seen me, and I would not force my company upon him. With my heart beating like a sledge-hammer I stepped behind a rock for concealment, when a large lizard darted across my feet, and I sprang back. I bit my lips in chagrin at my cowardice, but the action was unconscious and automatic. In an instant he was at my side, holding my hands with such a glad, happy look in his honest grey eyes.

"Where are you wandering to, all by yourself?" he asked, retaining my hands.

"Oh, I started out for a little stroll, but that nasty lizard has frightened me so that I believe I'll turn back," I said petulantly.

"Those lizards look formidable, but are harmless," he replied, smiling at my vehemence, as he poked about in the leaves until it ran away.

Still I stood irresolute, for I was suddenly confronted with the fear that, if I went home, he could do nothing less than accompany me, and thus I should make his visit compulsory.

"Let us sit here a while," he said, selecting for me a smooth stone, and seating himself on a gnarled root by my side. A soft breeze was blowing across the purple ocean—blowing from the direction of my home. I turned my face towards it, and held out my arms longingly.

Gazed at myself in the mirror.

"Do you love England so much?" he asked, softly, while the troubled look came back to his eyes.

"I would give my life to return to it," I answered, choking back a sob.

"And do you think you will never grow reconciled to India?" he queried, gently.

"I would not live here, if I had any choice in the matter—not if you made me empress of the whole country," I answered with an aggressive tilt of the chin. The consciousness that I was appearing at a disadvantage added to my irritation, and made me say things that went like dagger-thrusts to my own heart.

"As this is your father's home, your only chance of escape is to marry some man who can take you away" he said, as though thinking aloud.

"Yes," I responded recklessly, driven to bay by his cool

Digitized by Google

assumption of such a possibility. "Yes, I would marry an ogre to escape from this country."

Then he rose, and we walked slowly through the gathering twilight, the moon appearing like a fairy boat in a luminous archipelago of stars.

"Ah, what a large and brilliant glow-worm!" I exclaimed, pointing to the dark shadow of a date-tree, standing in front of the bungalow. "After what you have told me about them, I must certainly examine it," and I started on a run to the spot, when, with a cry of horror, Captain Rochester seized me in his arms, and bore me back to a young palm. He put me on my feet, and leant trembling against its slender stem.

"What is it? What is the matter?" I screamed, clinging to him, for he still kept his arm about my waist, and strained me to him with a pressure that was painful.

"There! There!" he gasped, with his eyes fixed on the date tree. "Oh, my darling, you were walking straight into the jaws of death!"

"Where? How?" I faltered.

"That is no glow-worm, little one. It is a najâ-kallu, and the cobra is not far distant. See, its light is continuous, and that of the glow-worm is intermittent. My God! what an escape you have had!" and overcome by his emotions, he folded me to his heart, kissing passionately my lips and eyes. "Ah, you will dislike India more than ever now!" he said, this thought ever prominent in his mind.

But I was wildly, deliriously happy, after my depression and fright, for a new light had dawned upon me, and I saw the cross-purposes at which we had been playing.

"I don't dislike India—I love it," I whispered, hiding my burning face on his breast.

"Did the Sahib call?" asked the old consarmi, standing before us, but discreetly turning his head to cough in his hand.

"I would marry an ogre to escape from this country."

The consarmi, like all native servants, seemed ubiquitous, and had a habit of appearing and disappearing most unaccountably.

"Get me your master's pistol, quick! There is a cobra under that tree," said Captain Rochester, pointing to the star-like glimmer in the grass.

Contrary to his usual alacrity when given an order, the consarmi stood as though paralysed.

"It is the devil-snake, and his najâ-kallu! Don't shoot, sahib!" he panted with chattering teeth. "Hindoo fix him. Make him kill hisse'f—you see," and, without awaiting permission, he disappeared round the bungalow.

"What does he mean? I don't understand," I asked.

"It's only another of their superstitions," Captain Rochester replied. "They believe if the cobra is killed that another will come to avenge his death, but if it can be made to commit suicide the evil power of the stone is overcome. I am glad you will have an opportunity of witnessing their jugglery."

We sat down on a garden-seat in the white moonlight, with our hearts too full for words. The cobra was now distinctly visible, in a brown coil, with its head waving slowly to and fro above the stone, as it skilfully snapped up the fire-flies that came within its reach. Soon the consarmi returned, with all the men about the stables and house, each with his arms full of cocoanut fibre, which they noiselessly heaped in a circle about the date-tree, and then commenced to sway their bodies and chant in a low voice, while some boys sat at their backs, and beat loudly on tom-toms.

It was a weird, truly Oriental scene. The night-winds rustling the tall palm-tops, the half-clad natives, with their barbaric incantations, and the death-dealing cobra before its shining stone, no longer heeding the fire-flies, but apparently hypnotised, and keeping perfect time with its head to the strokes of the tom-toms.

At a signal from the consarmi, the cocoanut fire was ignited, the tom-toms were beaten furiously, and the chant arose to almost a shriek. My father and mother, attracted by the noise, drew near, while the ayah ran about, madly tossing her arms and shouting: "A devil-snake! A devil-snake!"

The cobra, at the first flash of the flames, raised its terrible crest, striking out blindly in its rage, as it circled round and round the stone. As the din increased, and the fire leaped higher, it seized the najâ-kallu in its mouth, and made a dash to escape. Time and again it tried, but was driven back by the heat, when in a seeming frenzy of despair it dropped the stone, stuck its fangs into its own body, and, with a convulsive quiver, stretched itself out, dead.

There then went up a triumphant shout, in which we joined, and Sadi, who had been flogged for stealing my necklace, sprang into the circle, clutched the now harmless stone, and laid it at my feet. Imagine my surprise at finding that it was my lost necklace, and that the cobra had been the thief. The snake was an unusually large one, and had possibly lived about the house for years, feeding on mice. It undoubtedly gained access to my room through a rat-hole in the floor.

A week later, when the Alexandria steamed out of port, bound for England, I stood on deck at my husband's side, waving a brief adieu to India, and in my trunk, packed in soft cotton, was coiled the najâ-kallu necklace, for Caroline.

Digitized by Google

The Voice of Fate

EIGHT years ago I was foreman in the Carnford powder works.

It was a dangerous situation, and not altogether as pleasant as it might have been. But the salary was larger than I could obtain in any other place just then, and this, to a man with an invalid mother and a little sister to support, was no mean object. Besides I hoped at no very distant day to have a home of my own, presided over by the girl of my choice—beautiful Marion Ware. This dream of happiness in the future made me better contented with my life. I was willing to work for a competence that she would share with me.

We were to be married in November, and as the time drew near an intense desire seized me to escape from the momentous, dangerous existence I led in the mills. A few weeks would make no difference to my employers, I thought, and so when I gave my notice to leave I gave it for the 14th of September instead of November, as I had first intended.

My employers were very sorry to part with me, and they offered to raise my salary, but I had decided and was not to be turned from my decision. The last day of my stay passed quietly enough, and at night I left the dark buildings behind me with a thrill of relief.

That was a happy evening. Marion had been spending the afternoon with my mother, and I had walked home with her, and it was near midnight when I got home. Soon after I fell asleep, but my rest was troubled. I supposed I must have been dreaming, but it seemed a vivid reality to me then.

I was standing in the thick forest which surrounded the works, at the very point where the path to the village diverged and led it over the hill and through the field to the mills. There was a struggle in my mind; I thought I could not decide which path to take—the one leading into the distant village, or the old accustomed one to the mills. While I was sitting I heard a voice, clear, solemn and strong, that seemed to come from the ends of the earth, and it said:

"Go to the mills! Your work is not yet finished."

I awoke. The moon was shining coldly in at the window, and the great arms of the elms moved slowly to and fro in the night wind. I lay down again, thinking of little but my dream, save to rejoice that it was only a dream, and shortly after I fell asleep.

Again was that vision repeated with singular minuteness, circumstance for circumstance, and again I awoke. I thought it extremely remarkable that I should dream twice on the same matter, but explained it to myself that I had been thinking so much of my departure from the mills. It was a coincidence, nothing more, I said, and turning over I soon lost my consciousness.

For the third time that dream visited me, and this repetition was almost frightfully vivid. Everything about it bore so strongly the semblance of reality that I started up covered with cold perspiration.

I tried to shake off the spell that was on my spirit, but in vain.

I rose, and dressing myself went down to work in the garden. I was restless and uneasy, labouring under a consciousness of some duty unfulfilled.

At last I put down my hoe and went into the house. I put on my mill clothes and sought my mother. She looked up in surprise as I said:

"Mother, I am going to the mills."

"Indeed! I had hoped you were done going there, Edward. Yesterday was the fourteenth, was it not?"

"Yes; but I feel obliged to go to-day. My work is not yet done; it will be finished soon, I think."

I kissed her and went out. At the door of the grinding mill I met Mr. Morton, the senior proprietor. He grasped my hand eagerly.

"Ah, Green, glad to see you! What's this I hear about your leaving us? Lincoln was speaking about it last night. Why, we couldn't part with you at all."

"I did give notice to leave last night, and intended yesterday for my last day in the mill; but circumstances have decided me to remain some time longer—a month perhaps."

"Right; only you must set no time."

"Thank you; I will think of it," I said, and went on with my duties as usual.

Everything went quietly on in its accustomed routine. I began to smile at the absurdity of my last night's vision. "I had eaten too much supper; stayed out too long whispering soft nothings to Marion," I said to myself.

Towards night a party of visitors arrived. Such things were frequent. I went out to meet the party and to assist them in changing their shoes and garments that might have buttons of any metallic substance, for it was one of the cardinal regulations that no persons should be allowed in the interior mills who had a particle of metal about them, or nails in their shoes, for the fear of combustion by friction.

Our visitors were two gentlemen and three ladies. The two elder ladies I did not notice particularly, but the younger one attracted me in spite of myself. Why, I didn't know. She was not really beautiful—Marion was much more brilliant—but there was something about her better than beauty.

The gay company, laughing and joking, and bantering each other in regard to their fear, followed me in. The lady in blue walked quietly by my side, saying very little, barely replying to the lively sallies of her companions—perhaps she thought it ill-timed mirth; I don't know.

We had been all the rounds and had returned to the reception room, next to the drying room, at one end of the main building. This apartment overhung the pond, from whence came our supply of water, the basin of which was formed of a large dark gorge in the hollow of the wooded hills. There was a large swinging door opening from the room directly over the pond for the convenience of casting out rubbish, and this door I threw open for the visitors to obtain a view of the prospect beyond.

They soon tired of this, all but the lady in blue, who still stood looking out over the dreary scene, lighted by the departing rays of the lurid sun.

Suddenly I heard a low, ominous hiss from the adjoining apartment, a sound which once heard is always remembered; my blood turned to ice in my veins.

I recognised my fate—in another second's time we should be in eternity.

I snatched the woman by my side and plunged through the gaping doorway. Simultaneously a deafening roar burst upon my head. Down, down we went, it seemed, to an interminable depth, but that plunge saved us.

When we came up everything was still. A deathly silence had fallen on all nature—the place reeked with a suffocating smoke, rolling up in clouds from the ruins, dumb as the vapour of death.

I swam to the shore with my companion and supported her up the bank. She was not unconscious. Her dress was drenched with blood. I lifted my arm to seek the wound, and saw that the crimson tide flowed not from her veins, but from the mutilated stump where once belonged my own right hand. It had been blown off.

I went home as one in a walking dream. I remember very little of it except that the lady in blue was with me, and that she talked soothingly to me in a sweet voice, and that afterwards, when I suffered untold agonies from some sharp instrument, she stood by me with words of gentle rest and peace; after that, all was blank.

Digitized by Google

There was a little snow on the hills that I could see from the window. When I awoke to consciousness I spoke my first thought, "Where is Marion?" Mother tried to put me off with an evasive answer, but I would know the whole truth. She told it to me with great reluctance.

Marion had not been to see me since the day of the accident, and then at the sight of me she uttered a shriek of horror and fled from the room.

"But has she brought no message?"

"There is a note, but you must not read it till you are better. You have been eight weeks delirious, and the excitement may be fatal."

"Give me the letter," I said, with all my stern self-will in my voice. "If not, I will get up and seek it myself."

She brought it to me, the delicate, rose-perfumed thing, no more heartless than she who dictated it. It was elegantly got up altogether.

Miss Ware sympathised with me deeply—hoped and trusted I would be restored to health, and ended in releasing me from my engagement. She prayed I might be granted resignation, and closed by saying she was my most sincere and attached friend.

I crushed this scroll in my hand. I would have ground it to powder—annihilated its very dust from the face of the earth if I could.

Every day there was a fresh bouquet of hothouse flowers on the little stand by the bedside. After awhile I began to feel curious about them. I asked my mother where they came from.

"Miss Gaylord sent them."

"Miss Gaylord? I know no such person."

"The young lady you saved from the explosion. She is a Miss Adele Gaylord, and to her you owe an everlasting debt of gratitude, Edward. I often think she saved your life, for when you raved in delirium and would have torn off the bandages from your head when the surgeon had trepanned your wound, she alone had the power to quiet you."

Miss Gaylord called in several times during the next three weeks.

How beautiful she was to me now!

By the first of December I was able to sit up most of the time and go out a little.

One clear starlight night my mother left me for the first time during my illness. I brightened the fire on the hearth, drew up a great armchair and sat down to a quiet hour of dreaming. At the moment the door opened softly and Adele Gaylord came in.

Blushing and hesitating at seeing me alone, wrapped up in rich furs and crimson hood, she paused on the threshold. I rose to meet her.

"Come in, Miss Gaylord; I am glad to welcome you."

"Where is your mother?"

"Gone to the village with Effie. Let me take off your wraps, will you?"

"Indeed, I ought not to stay, Mr. Green; papa was going for a ride, and will be back at eight, and will take me home then. I called to say good-bye, Mr. Green," said she in a subdued voice; "I am going away to-morrow. We sail for Australia the first of February. Papa has business there which will detain him there for some years and he wishes me to go with him."

"Bon voyage. May Heaven prosper you."

I gave her my one hand. She laid hers in it, cold and trembling, and our eyes met. There were tears on her cheeks. They dropped down and fell on our clasped hands. A wild, beautiful hope sprung up in my heart, and yet hardly a proper move of a revelation.

"Oh, Adele, have I found life's sweetness to lose it for ever and ever? Would to Heaven I were well and strong once more!"

"And what then?" she said softly.

The next moment I held her in my arms.

The Recall

PAMELA stood in the centre of a low, square room in the "Heavenly Mansions"—large white buildings, with marble staircases, and flats in which only the wealthy could indulge.

The green lights in lily-shaped globes of electricity, held by a bronzed figure on a pedestal, cast a ghastly shadow over her face. Perhaps she was fatigued with the excitement of gambling, which had killed time for a set of worldly men and women, after a luncheon party at Pamela's, that Sunday afternoon.

The day being dull, they had called for lights; money chinked, and cards passed, while eyes grew greedy for gain. The light laughter and chaff gradually subsided, and as Pamela proposed higher stakes, her guests caught the infectious eagerness. Though ill-fortune claimed her for its own, her ardour seemed undamped. She was not to be hampered by ordinary limits; yet a keen observer might have noticed that her hands trembled, and when the company rose to go she steadied herself by grasping the back of a chair.

One by one they bade her farewell, with murmured compliments and thanks.

"How charming you are, my dear!" cried a gaily-attired widow, imparting an airy kiss on Pamela's pale lips, "always the life and soul of everything. While you are in the world, there can be no such word as ennui in your friends' vocabulary."

"So kind of you to come," was the faint reply, and, as she spoke, Pamela fancied the room swam in a chaos of light and colour, while a sudden wind seemed to blow dust into her eyes.

"Your boudoir looks terribly dissipated," laughed Charley Elkin, scattering the cards on the floor. "There's an effect for you, Pamela! Stand in the midst of your fallen Kings and Queens, and pose as a new model for the 'Road to Ruin!'"

"Ha! ha! capital joke that!" laughed a red-faced army man, mistaking her tragic expression for a jest. "Here, Charley, my boy, give me some wine, and let us drink the health of our fair hostess."

She stood statue-like, as the speaker bowed low, and held up his glass.

"Will they never leave?" murmured a voice at her elbow. Pamela moved away quickly; it froze her blood. Yet to the man addressing her she merely appeared somewhat listless and indifferent. Gradually they straggled out, these society puppets, who turned night into day, and day into night, ignoring all lofty principles, and wasting every moment of their reckless, ill-spent lives.

"Pamela!" It was the same voice again, low and alluring. "Won't you listen to me now?"

Her wild despairing eyes read in the man's face a hateful fact. He loved her. Arnold Craven, with his boundless wealth and unscrupulous nature, was ready to lay it all at the feet of the woman who despised him. She glanced at her luxurious surroundings, but in the soft velvet draperies and costly furniture she saw only the black word "Ruin!"

In a few days Pamela Pemberton would be a bankrupt. The life of ease and pleasure faded from her sight, and poverty—grim, stark, inexorable—stared her in the face.

"Escape!" The word rang in her brain. Oh! blessed cry of harassed souls, who see the possibility within their grasp! "There are two roads," she said to herself, as Arnold Craven lingered alone, "two distinct roads, which lead away—away—from poverty and wretchedness."

Numb and pulseless, as though some invincible power had turned her to stone, Pamela walked restlessly to the window, staring down on the vast city. The mists of evening gathered thickly, spreading over church spires and gloomy roofs, steeped in the soot of ages. Involuntarily she stretched out her arms to the sky, fancying the densely-clouded heavens reflected her own misery.

Digitized by Google

The man watched her with eager eyes. "What is the matter?" he asked.

Pamela gave a short laugh.

"I was only looking at the world," she replied. "It is such a queer unreasonable place, and the sky, too—what an odd mixture of light and shade! In these days of rush and hurry, Nature passes unnoticed, unappreciated."

"You have a beautiful mind," he said, "and a sweet unselfish disposition, which is very scarce in this distracted age. Oh! Pamela, won't you give me a ray of hope? I have a right to plead my love!"

"Yes; I will hear you," she replied, with an effort at calmness. "I will hear you, Arnold, but not to-day—not to-day!" Her face set in rigid lines, and her breath came and went unevenly. "I am not well," she continued, pressing her hand to her throat, and speaking in a half-strangled whisper. "Please go."

He seized her hands, and kissed them passionately.

"May I carry away with me the one word—hope?"

"Yes," she replied, "hope always. It is the sap of life. When hope leaves us we are indeed desolate."

He tried to draw her closer, but she started back, yet concealing the loathing she felt. "Good-bye," she faltered, as he turned to go.

"When may I see you again?" he asked, pausing at the door, and devouring her with his eyes. "When will you make me the happiest man in the world?"

"When I ask you to return," she answered. "I shall give the sign, Arnold, and you will know then that I am ready to accept your—your offer."

She had intended saying "love," but the word stuck in her throat.

He bowed his head and left her, still with the same wild look on her face.

"Love," she muttered; "his love and his money. It would be easier to pass through the eye of a needle than to——." She broke off with an exclamation of disgust, and, leaning her elbows on the mantel-piece, gazed with a sense of horror in the mirror.

Her colourless lips were parted, her cheeks drawn and thin. She had pushed a mass of waving curls far off her high white forehead, and pressed two burning hands against her temples. They were throbbing and racking with sharp, unbearable pain. Through the open window chimes of evening bells reached her ears.

"I am weather-beaten with the storms of life," she said mournfully, listening to the monotonous ticking of the clock, for the loneliness of the room oppressed her. She was very cold, but did not move to close the window, though the air blew in upon her.

It was bleak, dark, and rainy without.

Suddenly an expression of exquisite tenderness stole over Pamela's face, at some recollection of her lost girlhood. Her eyes softened, while an infinite pity beamed in their depths for her own misguided career. But it was only for a moment, and then the memory of those two roads leading in such opposite directions returned with redoubled force.

Rousing herself, she opened a drawer, taking something small and heavy from a leather case. It lay a moment in her grasp, then fell from Pamela's trembling fingers. With a cry she clasped her hands before her eyes, and drew herself cowering to the further side of the room. She watched it lying on the hearthrug, her wide open eyes strained and bloodshot, her lips parted with overmastering fear.

The pale electric light gleamed in the dying day, as a weak, exhausted woman decided upon the road.

Someone below commenced playing the soft, slow music of a waltz. Breathless and panting Pamela rushed to the door, and whistled down to inquire if Mr. Craven had already left the building. Only a few moments since they parted, yet to her hours had elapsed.

"No."

The answer sent a thrill through her. Had he expected this recall?

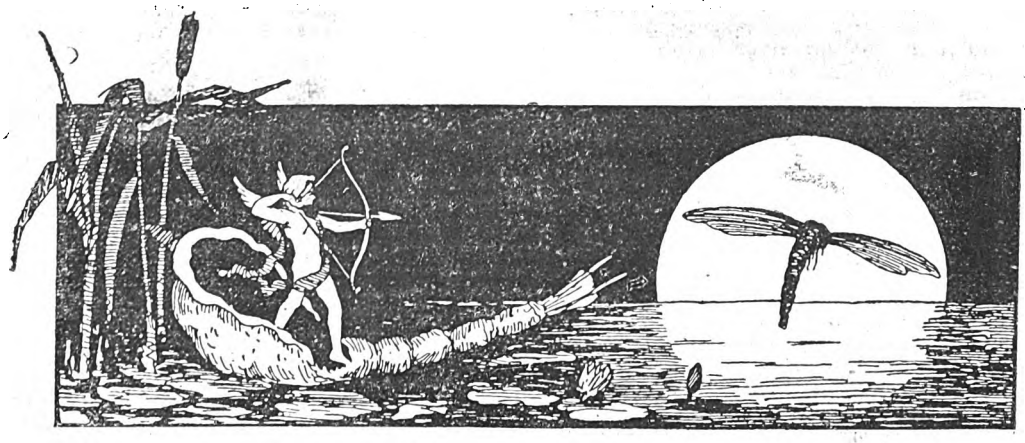
"Ask him to come up," she said.

Then Pamela walked across the room, her trailing skirt brushing the fallen cards, and snatched that "something" off the hearthrug.

In the meanwhile Arnold retraced his footsteps, enraptured at the message. The woman he loved had called him back of her own free will, and his longing, hungry heart beat high with feverish expectation. Already in imagination he could feel the fragile form in his arms, and the touch of warm lips on his forehead. She had given the promised sign and relented—at last! at last!

He heard the swinging, dream-like waltz below, as he approached her door—a languid three-time melody, and his happiness was such that he knew not of care in the present, or a soul to be saved in the future. He would have suffered years of anguish for this one moment's anticipation, as he burst into her presence with a half-smothered cry of joy—"Pamela!"

The word rang out in the silence of that awful room, while Arnold Craven recoiled shuddering from the sight which met his startled gaze. The rigid figure of a woman lay stretched upon the hearthrug, grasping a revolver in one hand, and the page of Pamela's life had closed for ever.



Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS' TREASURE.

Illustrated by MR. A. KEMP TEBBY.

SUMMARY.

The mail train has been robbed between Cornwall and La Grange stations, and £20,000 worth of gold stolen by a gang of desperadoes, headed by two brothers named Mulligan. Two passengers on the train—Adolph Squirrek, alias Smith, a detective tracking the Mulligans, and Fred Weldon, a young lawyer—who have struck up an acquaintance on the way, alight at Somerville, where the former stops at the "Drover," and the latter at his mother's house. During the night a message comes to say that Judge Woodland's horse has come back alone, and Weldon, together with Squirrek and two other men set out to find him, and discover one of Mulligan's confederates lying senseless on the road.

CHAPTER VI.

LOVE'S YOUNG DREAM.

GREAT were the amazement and relief of the four men when they found that instead of the body of Judge Woodland they beheld that of one of the outlaws. A brief examination showed that he had been struck upon the side of the face and terribly bruised, and a closer examination revealed that the bruise had been made by the hoof of a horse.

"What is the meaning of this?" asked Fred Weldon, looking up in the faces of his companions.

"It is a good sign, and affords more grounds for hope than anything that has happened since his absence."

All the three looked inquiringly at the detective.

"This villain has attacked Judge Woodland, with the purpose of killing him, and while the affray has been going on, the horse has had a hand, or rather a foot in the matter, and knocked this dog out of time entirely."

"But where is he?"

"That I cannot tell. We can't do anything for this scamp at present, so you may lay him down by the roadside, and you may keep watch of the horses, while Weldon and myself take a look further down the road."

The two men walked quietly along, speaking in a low tone.

"I only fear that some more of the gang are near," said Fred, "and they may steal a march upon us."

"There is not one of them in the vicinity."

The confidence with which this was uttered reassured the young lawyer, and satisfied him at the same time that the man was more than he suspected him to be.

"Don't trouble yourself any further with speculations regarding me," said the detective, with a smile, as if he read his thoughts. "Call at the hotel to-morrow, and I will have something to say to you. At present we must attend to the business before us."

They came upon the wreck of the carriage, lying in a heap at the side of the road.

A few steps further, and they came upon the wreck of the carriage, lying in a heap at the side of the road.

"That will tell the story!" exclaimed the detective, moving towards it. "Not too fast, or you will hide the evidence by your foot-prints. Suppose you remain still, and let me look round for a few minutes?"

Digitized by Google

Fred gladly did this, and the detective made a long and careful examination, walking so far from the road that he was lost to view for nearly half an hour. When he came back he went to the battered hulk of the carriage again, all the time never exchanging a word with the wondering young man, who was intently watching his movements. Finally he finished.

"And what have you learned?" inquired Fred.

"All!" was the reply, uttered with a confident smile; "let us go back to where our friends are waiting, to save telling the story twice."

"The way of it was this," said the detective, when the four men stood together again, "but in the first place oblige me with a light, as my cigar has gone out."

The Havanna was deliberately lit, and the detective proceeded:

"Judge Woodland was delayed yesterday very much beyond the time he anticipated getting home. It was late in the evening when he drove through these woods, and he overtook a man on foot, who asked to ride. This man was the groaning scamp who lies out there, and he was waiting for the purpose of killing the judge; and I shouldn't wonder if this outlaw was the very one you speak of as having been rather heavily sentenced by that functionary several years ago. Well, the judge picked him up, of course, and all went along quietly until they reached a point a hundred yards or two down the road, when the fellow drew a pistol and attempted to shoot the old gentleman. I think his weapon missed fire, although I cannot be sure upon that point, and the two grappled and rolled forward out of the carriage under the feet of the horse, which had been so frightened by the report of the pistol and the struggling that she let out with her feet, kicking the assassin, and freeing the judge from his troublesome parasite.

"How far off did this happen?"

"Quite a way down the road. The mare has kicked herself loose and then dashed for home, and this man has crawled away for help, but has not been able to get far."

"But where is the judge?" inquired Fred Weldon.

"That is a question which I cannot answer positively. I consider it certain that he has not been killed, although he may have been hurt. My belief is that, if hurt, he is at the nearest neighbour's, and if not injured, he has gone home by a different route from the one he usually takes."

"What shall we do?"

"Go back home."

The advice of the detective was followed at once. The outlaw had ceased his moaning and lay quiet, as if listening to the remarks of those round him.

"Before we take him in hand we had better make an examination," said the detective, and, stooping over, in common parlance, "went through" him, discovering two pistols and an immense bowie-knife.

"We may as well take charge of these, as they're not very good medicine for a well or sick man, and this dog may take it into his head to recuperate a little on the way."

The body was lifted unresistingly upon the horse in front of the officer, and the party started homeward. In the course of a mile they reached a farmer's house, standing some distance from the road, where they halted, and one of them roused up the people. Nothing was known of Judge Woodland, and the party resumed their way homeward.

Just as they struck into the main turnpike, day began breaking, and it was broad daylight when they reached Woodland's residence. All were anxious and nervous as Fred dismounted and walked to the door to knock.

Before he could do so he was encountered by Jacob, whose first greeting caused the heart of the young man to sink:

"Did you find the judge?"

"No."

"Of course you didn't," laughed the man, "'cause he came home last night."

"He did, eh? At what time?"

"About an hour after you left."

The detective, who had heard every word uttered, now indulged in a quiet smile as his words were verified.

"Was he wounded?"

"Not a scratch, but he was very tired, and I don't s'pose he will be up for an hour or two."

"Give him our compliments and congratulations, and tell him I will call during the forenoon to see him."

She observed that he took extra care in preparing his toilet.

Fred Weldon's horse belonged to Judge Woodland, so he walked to Somerville beside the others. When they reached the main road, the prisoner made a desperate struggle to escape and well-nigh succeeded. But he was more firmly secured, and a short time after was placed in the county gaol at Somerville, while the three men separated to their homes.

Fred Weldon sought a few hours' rest, but woke again ere the forenoon was half gone, and, after eating his dinner, told his mother he would go over and see how the judge was getting along. She observed that he took extra care in preparing his toilet for the occasion, and she shrewdly suspected that it was not the old gentleman alone whom he was so anxious to see.

The truth of it was, that Florence Woodland was a star whom Fred Weldon had worshipped from afar. Beautiful and accomplished, she was the centre of admiration for more than a score of the leading young men of the town and neighbourhood.

Fred Weldon remembered her as the "bright particular one" of his childhood—the one who figured in his dreams of a roseate future, and whom, some day, when he had won the grand position towards which he had turned all his energies, he should claim as his bride.

But here the young lawyer was twenty-four years along life's pathway, and that glorious day seemed farther away than ever. The daily hand-to-hand encounter with the realities of life had sufficed to take a great deal of the romance out of his disposition, but it had not clouded the vision which still floated before him in his night and day dreams.

Outwardly calm and self-possessed, but inwardly faltering and distrustful, he ascended the steps of Judge Woodland's residence, and gave a knock at the door. He was immediately ushered into the presence of the old gentleman, who was heartily glad to welcome the young man who had been so ready to go to his assistance, and in whom, ever since his childhood, the judge had felt a warm interest.

Digitized by Google

With the pleasant words of Florence ringing in his ears.

The facts of the case were found to be almost precisely as stated by the detective. The judge had been delayed much beyond the time anticipated, and it was already dark when he reached the Ten-Mile Woods. Here he picked up a traveller, who attempted to shoot him, and would have done so had not his pistol missed fire.

The old gentleman grasped the man, and a furious struggle followed, terminating by the parties rolling under the heels of the mare, that kicked the assassin with almost fatal violence, and then broke away.

The judge easily disentangled himself and started homeward. He freely confessed that he was thoroughly frightened, and instead of keeping to the road, he travelled across country, wandering astray, and reaching his distracted household in the small hours of the morning.

The interview was very cordial, and when Fred bade the old gentleman "good-day," Florence went with him to the door, there took hold of his hand, and turning her deep blue eyes upon him, said:

"I thank you for your promptness in coming to us when we were in distress. To-morrow evening there is to be a gathering of a few friends here, and you must promise me that you will come."

"I promise you," replied the young lawyer, who felt that it would have been a pleasure to have promised his life under the circumstances.

CHAPTER VII.

AT JUDGE WOODLAND'S.

As Fred Weldon walked homeward from his visit to Judge Woodland's, with the pleasant words of Florence ringing in his ears, and with the delightful anticipation of fulfilling the promise made her, he unexceptedly found himself in view of the Drover's Hotel, and he recalled the engagement he had made with his friend, Mr. Smith.

A few minutes later they were seated together in the apartment of the detective, with the door securely locked.

"You probably have suspected my identity," said he with a smile, as he proceeded to light his inevitable cigar.

"I suspect you to be a detective."

"Correct."

And thereupon Mr. Squirrek proceeded to state as much regarding himself as is already known to the readers, and adding:

"For the present I am your friend, plain Mr. Smith, John Smith, if you so wish, travelling for my health, and as such you will remember to address me when others are within hearing. My sole object in this neighbourhood is to settle matters with these Mulligan brothers."

"Why do you make such a confidant of me?" inquired Fred, who thought the proceeding a rather unprofessional one, but who for all that was not a little flattered by the mark of confidence.

"Simply because I can't very well help it. However, if you have any objection, our intercourse can continue without anything further being said upon the matter," said Squirrek.

"Not at all; don't misunderstand me," Weldon hastened to say. "Upon a matter like this, I wish simply to understand everything, the preliminary steps as well as those which follow."

"Business is business," said Squirrek, in his easy, off-hand manner. "You will admit that my profession requires a tolerable knowledge of human nature. Not until I was satisfied of the timber of which you were made did I determine to take you into my confidence. I have been studying you ever since you caught my eye in the train, and the result is the satisfaction of knowing you are the man I want."

"State your case," said the lawyer.

"The man who succeeds in breaking up this gang under the leadership of the Mulligan brothers makes £2,000, and here is the man who is going to do it!" exclaimed the detective, slapping his hand upon his knee.

"I fervently hope so."

"But I want a partner, and you're the man!"

"Ah! I begin to understand."

"The last case that I was in was in Cincinnati, and while there I gained a thread which has drawn me into this."

"Have you undertaken it alone?"

"I have. There is not a living man who suspects my errand except yourself. I could have brought a dozen men with me, all of whom are used to this sort of business, but I prefer to select my material from this neighbourhood, and to follow out my own ideas."

"We two men against eight?"

"There are only seven," interrupted the detective.

"Three and a half men apiece. I don't see the prospect of success."

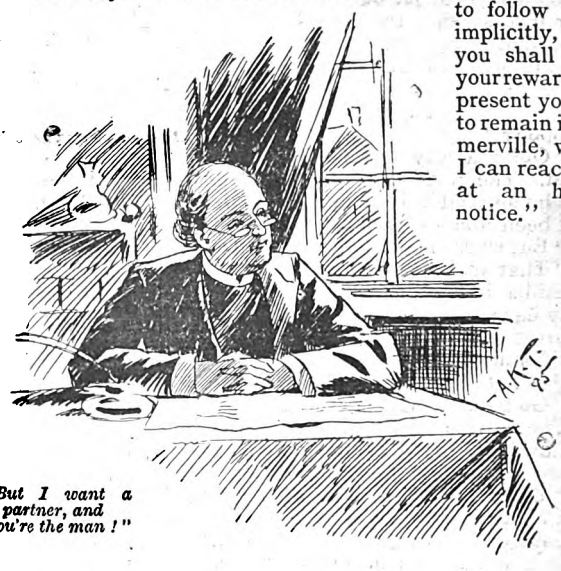
"The way isn't clear to me, but I have some experiments which I wish to make. Very probably we shall have to organise a vigilance committee, and it is hardly to be expected that we shall receive the whole reward ourselves; but there is no good reason why we shouldn't wind up the career of these scamps within a few weeks or months. Am I mistaken in conjecturing that some hundreds of pounds will not come amiss to you?"

"I rather fancy not," laughed Fred; "you might hunt a long time before finding one who would be happier to receive it."

"Precisely. Then the partnership of Squirrek and Weldon begins from date."

"I am willing. What is my first duty?"

"To hold yourself in readiness to receive my commands, to follow them implicitly, and you shall reap your reward. At present you are to remain in Somerville, where I can reach you at an hour's notice."



"But I want a partner, and you're the man!"

Digitized by Google

"My intention is to spend a week here, at least."

"That is good! When I have anything to communicate I will see you. I presume I shall meet you at Judge Woodland's to-morrow evening?"

"Will you be there?" asked Fred, in pleased surprise.

"The Judge and myself are old acquaintances. I knew him when you were a schoolboy in this town."

"Does he know you are here?"

"Not at all, and I have no invitation to his party; but I shall go, nevertheless, and he will be glad enough to see me."

"Then he, too, will know your errand?"

"I think he has dealt with criminals long enough to be intrusted with a secret," said the detective, with another bland smile.

"No doubt of that."

The interview lasted half-an-hour or so longer, and then Fred Weldon bade his friend good-day and repaired to his home.

When he reached the residence of Judge Woodland on the evening of the following day, he found a large assemblage there, and almost the first thing that attracted his attention was the old gentleman and the detective sitting apart in the most cordial converse.

Florence Woodland received him with a warmth of manner which set his heart all of a flutter and raised his happiness to the highest point.

But the rose had its thorn, and the powerful emotion that had taken possession of him was alloyed by the sharp pangs of insipient jealousy. A tall, dark, and handsome Spanish-looking gentleman whirled past him, with his arm encircling the slender waist of Florence Woodland, and Fred felt as if he could have knocked him down.

But, when he was introduced to Señor Alvarido Almanaz, a gentleman from Cuba, he bowed low and expressed himself happy to make his acquaintance, although, at the same moment, he would have given anything in the world could it have sufficed to banish the noble señor to his home in the tropical isle.

He was introduced to Senor Alvarido Almanaz.

"I believe I have seen your Cuban friend before," remarked Fred, when he gained the coveted opportunity of speaking a word or two to Florence.

"No! he is a stranger in Somerville."

"May I ask you where you first met him?"

"At the sulphur springs last summer. You know father always spends a few weeks there during each August."

"He seems to be quite a prepossessing gentleman."

"He is very accomplished—plays and sings beautifully."

"Is he staying in Somerville?"

"He is spending a few days with us. He was so kind and attentive to father when we were in Virginia the last time, that we urged him to make us a visit, and he surprised us yesterday by coming. I am so glad he arrived in time to be with us to-night."

A few minutes later and the señor was seated at the piano, running his long, jewelled fingers over the keys, while his really fine voice filled the room with music of a Spanish serenade. The whole company were hushed into silence, while the melody delighted their ears, and when he rose from the instrument there was a universal clapping of hands, and even Fred Weldon could not but admit that the plaudits were well earned.

The Cuban showed such marked attention to Florence Woodland that there were none who failed to notice it. He was a good dancer, and there was not a woman present who did not prefer him as a partner to anyone in the room; but, for all that, he appeared to see none but his hostess, and he followed her as the loadstone follows the magnet.

At the supper table he sat beside her, and when the night wore into the small hours, and the company began separating, the last couple dancing were he and Florence.

Fred Weldon was racked with jealousy. From being the happiest, he was the most miserable of mortals, and he felt like rebelling against the fate that had ever brought him and the fascinating girl together.

"And yet what right have I to any such feeling?" he asked himself, when he had time to collect his thoughts. "What claim have I upon her? There has never a word of love passed between us."

As he was ready to depart, he made a search for his friend Smith, the detective, and learnt that that gentleman had left several hours before, so he walked home alone through the still autumn night, his reflections tinged with a sadness he had not felt for years.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE TRIAL.

"FREDERICK WELDON,—You are hereby notified that if you appear as witness against poor Jim Borie, that got kicked by the horse when he was riding with Judge Woodland, you shall not live ten days longer. A word to the wise ought to be sufficient."

This was the missive our young friend received a few days subsequent to the social gathering at Judge Woodland's. It was placed under his door at night, and was given to him at the breakfast table by his mother. He read it carefully through twice, then placed it in his pocket, and finished his morning meal, without enlightening his mother as to its character.

Fred reflected that the captured outlaw, who was then lying in gaol, had so far recovered that he was to be brought to trial during the present term of the Court, which was then in session. Judge Woodland had so expedited matters that it would probably come on the very next day. Being a witness himself in the case, of course it was out of his power to preside at the trial, but there was little doubt of the conviction of the scamp, who richly deserved hanging.

Digitized by Google

A few minutes later Fred Weldon was closeted with Detective Squirrek, who, with his chair tipped back, his heels on the table, and a cigar between his teeth, scanned the missive as he would have done a bill of fare at the restaurant.

"What do you think of it?" inquired the young lawyer.

"It is a genuine document," he replied, as he turned it over in his hand, and looked at the back of it. "My young friend, that letter means business. Just so sure as you testify against that villain will your life be attempted."

"My heavens!" exclaimed Fred, as he excitedly walked the floor. "Isn't it a satire on a government? To think that a man cannot give testimony without his life being threatened!"

"Tut, tut, not so fast. There can be no form of human government that can prevent such things entirely. When you get to the top rung of your ladder, no doubt you will make all things right. Just now we have got to face the practical facts."

"If subpœnaed I shall testify, if the whole Mulligan gang stand between me and the court-house. I shall go about as I always do, and if I am assassinated, it will be done when I am asleep. I wonder whether Jim and Tom have been warned?"

"Yes; both received letters precisely the same as yours, and both have been so thoroughly frightened that they have gone away, and won't be back till the trial is over, so that they are out of this business, and, beyond the judge himself, you will be the only witness."

"But you?"

"Will not be subpœnaed."

"But you can tell as much and more than I can."

"All very true; and I asked the privilege of testifying, but the judge thinks it better for me to remain in the back-ground, as there is no real necessity for the statement of anyone beside the one whose life is attempted. That, you know, will send the man up for twenty years."

"After which, comes the journey to the state prison, when we shall have to run the gauntlet of the gang again."

"I think it can be done successfully this time. About this

"My young friend, that letter means business."

The black eyes of the Cuban seemed to burn into the young lawyer.

warning. I observe that the three are in the same handwriting, which is evidently a disguised one, and there is the curious fact that only the three who were subpœnaed have been warned. I, who certainly know as much as the rest of you, and who am as accessible, have received never a word. Rather singular, isn't it?"

"What does it indicate?"

"It looks to me as if those three missives were written in Somerville by some person whom we have met."

"Have you encountered any person who looked suspicious?"

Fred Weldon recalled afterwards that the detective avoided making a direct reply to this question.

"You must not suppose the eight, or rather the seven, as it now stands, are all rough, desperate-looking chaps, who herd together, and show to any countryman that they are outlaws. They may occasionally meet together, but I am well satisfied that some of them pass as gentlemen, and are never suspected of being anything else."

This was rather startling information, or rather conjecture, and gave Weldon a powerful realisation of the extraordinary power which this organisation of criminals wielded, and of the vast difficulty in bringing all of them to justice.

"Have you any particular advice to give?" inquired Fred, when there had been a moment's silence between them.

"Nothing; except that you must go to the trial to-morrow, and give your testimony in as straightforward a manner as possible."

"Will you be there?"

"Yes, I shall."

As a matter of course the court was crowded on the succeeding day to suffocation, and there were scores who were turned away, unable to gain admission. When the prisoner was produced, all eyes were centred upon him, for it would be impossible to tell how deep was the terror inspired by this association of men.

The prosecuting barrister, when he arose to his feet, showed that none held the gang in more abject fear than did he; and his speech of half-an-hour's duration was one of the most windy perorations, full of fury, and at the same time containing absolutely nothing.

The counsel for the defence was feelingly eloquent, for he was inspired by the most powerful motives which can sway an abject mind.

But the evidence could not be gainsaid. "Poor Tom

Digitized by Google

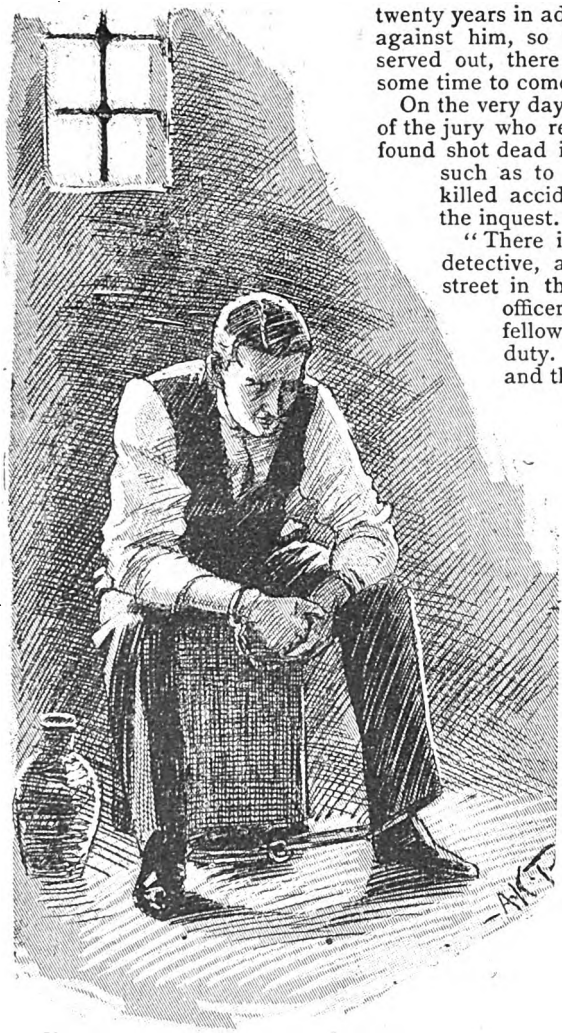
Borie" was positively identified as the one who had attempted the life of Judge Woodland, and he was further recognised as the identical villain who still had twenty years to serve for his having been rescued while on his way to prison before.

The judge's charge to the jury was so pointed that none of them durst shirk their duty, and they were forced to bring in the prisoner guilty, when he was remanded back to gaol to await sentence.

During the proceedings it became known that each member of the jury had received a warning letter precisely similar to that which had been sent to Fred Weldon and his friends. The detective managed to obtain a glimpse of several of these and found, as he anticipated, that one hand had written them all.

Among the spectators, Fred noticed two who manifested the most intense interest in the proceedings. One of these was Squirrek, the detective, and the other was Señor Almanaz, and rather curiously the two sat side by side. The black eyes of the Cuban seemed to burn into the young lawyer, and he bowed pleasantly to him, as their glances met.

There was nothing to be apprehended from an open attempt at rescue in a town of the size of Somerville; but there was reason to believe that everything would be done to get the outlaw out of gaol. Consequently the utmost precautions were taken. He was heavily ironed, and placed in the most secure cell, while the guard looked in upon him every half-hour during the day and night.



He was heavily ironed, and placed in the most secure cell

A few days after the trial, "poor Tom Borie" received twenty years in addition to the twenty which still stood against him, so that if the sentence were faithfully served out, there was very little to fear from him for some time to come.

On the very day that the criminal was sentenced, one of the jury who resided a mile or two out of town was found shot dead in a wood. The circumstances were such as to render it possible that he had been killed accidentally, and such was the verdict of the inquest.

"There is no doubt in my mind," said the detective, as he and Fred sauntered down the street in the gloom of the early evening, the officer smoking his Havana. "The poor fellow has paid the penalty of doing his duty. A little more of this kind of business and the whole country will be aroused."

"Don't you think the Mulligans are too wise to overleap the mark, and push things too far?"

"Their long immunity has made them careless. I think it will come to this in the end."

"They haven't made the attempt on me yet."

"That's no reason to think they will not do so. You may depend upon it, you are a marked man."

"Am I to remain here indefinitely through fear of these miscreants?"

"Not at all; I have been thinking to-day that it is nearly time you returned to your office at Brampton. But the time has hardly come yet. Wait a little longer. You will soon be swept into a current of events which will make your blood tingle with excitement."

"I do not understand you."

"I cannot explain at present," said the detective, slipping his arm into that of his young friend, as they turned to retrace their steps, and then he added in a low voice, and in a tone thrilling with meaning:

"There is a prize awaiting success of which you little dream."

(To be continued.)

THE MISSING FINGERS.

THE index and middle fingers of the left hand were missing. The two remaining fingers and thumb were well-formed, delicate and tapering. A palmist would have said that the formation of the hand denoted character.

Ethel Allen could not possibly have failed to notice such a hand especially as it lay on the table d'hôte of the Antrim Arms, immediately adjoining her.

Its owner manipulated his fork with singular grace and seemed to take pride in his three-digit dexterity.

The Allens, en route for the States, after a six months' tour of Europe, were giving a few days to the north of Ireland and the Giants' Causeway, and it was at the railway hotel at Portrush that they made the acquaintance of the Baron du Rhem, as the man with the missing fingers called himself.

The Allens were of that delightfully popular set of middle-class Americans that "do" Europe "regardless of expense," and keep alive in the minds of foreign hotel and shop-keepers the prevailing belief that all Americans are walking gold-mines.

Not only were the Allens—Mr., Mrs., and Miss—truly democratic in their tastes; they were positively bewildering in their habits and manner of making friends.

"I always judge a gent by his jewellery," was one of old Josiah Allen's maxims.

"A lady proclaims herself such by her dress," was an adage of Mrs. Allen.

And the daughter laid down her axiom: "If a young feller's well turned out, he'll do."

It was natural, then, that the Baron du Rhem, scion of the ancient and noble house of that name, should have made a most favourable impression upon these people.

The Baron wore diamonds and rubies, gems every one of them—a four-carat stone of matchless brilliancy on the little finger of the stumpy hand, a huge pigeon-blood ruby of perfect purity on the third finger of the sound right.

In evening dress the Baron flashed like a retired plumber of the comic weekly. His shirt-front was a sea of dazzling light, and the Baron's various chronometers, watch-chains, charms, jewelled cigarette and cigar case, called forth exclamations of admiration from Mr. Allen, who pronounced him the first foreigner of real distinction he had ever met.

Digitized by Google

Ethel thought the Baron just too sweet for anything. He had such a dear little broken-English, heart-breaking drawl; he was so courtly and chivalrous, so romantic and interesting, with his coal black hair and eyes, his classic Grecian features, and his poor maimed hand.

The two fingers, he informed Miss Allen, five minutes after exchanging common table d'hôte civilities, had been blown off by "the explosion of his fowling piece while hunting on his estates in the south of France." The gun had burst in his hands, lacerating two fingers so badly that amputation had been necessary, she told her father who was trying to understand him, but could not. The Allens were charmed, delighted with the Baron.

"He has the genuwine Burgundian look, Josiah," remarked Mrs. Allen to her husband, as they were preparing for bed.

"Bourbon, you mean, my dear," he timidly corrected.

"Oh, as you please, Josiah," she replied airily; "the words are anonymous. What a ketch for Ethel! Jest fancy our bringing back to Ditchfield a real live French baron of the old reejyme. He showed me some photographs of his chateaux at Nay in the south of France. He sighed as he showed them to me. I fear his estates are encumbered, Josiah: old ancestral mortgages. How few Americans can boast of mortgages a century old, Josiah!"

"He's a nobby little dresser, Maria; I never see such diamonds before."

"Baron," said Mr. Allen the next morning, as the two leant against the bar of the Antrim Arms, where they had been chatting with the barmaid for over an hour, "Baron, what do you say to a run across the pond with us? We all like you so much that we want you to make us a visit at Ditchfield. And, Baron," here Josiah Allen's voice sank to a confidential whisper as he softly dug the Baron in the ribs, "that gal of mine seems to think a lot of you. He! he! she told her ma so!"

"Indeed!" murmured the Baron, a pleased and amused smile playing about his lips as he stroked his piratical black moustache reflectively. "America! the great country I have heard and read so much about," he said pensively; "the land of the free and the home of the brave. You do me much honour, my dear friend, and it would afford me much pleasure to accompany you, but——"

Here the Baron made a judicious pause.

"But what?" impatiently demanded Mr. Allen.

"The fact is, my dear friend," went on the Baron, "I could hardly visit America—the land of the Anarchist and Socialist, the home of the Interviewer, the great American Reporter—in my true character. I should have to conceal my identity and travel incognito. If I could sail under your name—as one of your family let us say—a son or a very near relative, I might escape the disagreeable notoriety that would surely be attendant on the arrival of the Baron du Rhem in the United States. I have various reasons, my dear Allen; one, the best, is that I am connected with a political movement afoot, the instigators of which are supposed to be continually under the surveillance of the secret agents of the French Government. Here in the north of Ireland, at this little inn, I have permitted myself to be known to you by my true name and title; but on leaving this place I shall be forced to assume a different name and character."

"I think I understand you, Baron; you are more or less a political exile, and are endeavouring to keep your movements as quiet as possible in order to baffle the Government's secret service?"

"Exactly," answered the Baron.

"Well," said Mr. Allen, decidedly, "when we take the steamer at Queenstown you shall go on board as my son, Mr. Maurice Allen. Our quiet little home circle at Ditchfield will only know the Baron du Rhem, the last of the Bourbons."

When the City of Madrid took on the mails at Queenstown, the tender brought on board a number of passengers, among them the Allens, and their newly-found French friend, now known and treated as one of the family.

To the great surprise of the Allens, the first person they met as they came on board was young Treadwell Slote, of Ditchfield, one of Ethel's most ardent admirers. He informed them he had run over for a little trip, having guessed successfully a newspaper problem involving the placing of the first, second and third horses in the big race of the year—the prize being a first-class circular trip to London and Paris, with four weeks to make it in, the newspaper defraying all expenses.

"Well, you was always lucky, Treadwell," observed Mrs. Allen, and then she grew somewhat confused, for he was gazing curiously at the Frenchman devoting himself to Ethel, and Mrs. Allen did not know exactly how to introduce the two.

"Treadwell," said she, "he's the Baron du Rhem, one of the Burgundy people. He's incog. Call him Allen, for that is the name he has assumed travelling with us."

Slote looked at her in surprise.

"I don't quite understand," he said; but the introduction was forthcoming, and he bowed to the new Mr. Allen.

Young Slote was very much disgusted with what he termed their "gullible incredulity."

Whoever had heard of the Du Rhem family, or read of them? he asked. This man might be an adventurer for all they knew.

Mr. and Mrs. Allen put down these remarks as prompted by jealousy, and Ethel turned up her nose at him when meeting him on deck the next morning, giving him an awful snub as she passed clinging to the Baron's arm.

Slote was sitting in the smoking-room of the vessel an hour later, moodily meditating on the tomfoolery of the world in general, and his friends, the Allens, in particular. He was puffing away at his pipe in an exceedingly irritable frame of mind, when a fellow voyager entered to order a drink and enjoy a smoke.

The steward had taken his order, and left them alone.

The stranger sat down on the seat next to Slote.

"Pardon me," he said, "but I should like to ask you a question."

His manner and tone were so abrupt, business-like and brusque, that young Slote stared at him in perfect astonishment.

"Well, what is it?" he stammered.

"Are you travelling with a party on this ship by the name of Allen?" asked the stranger.

"No," replied Slote. "Why do you ask?"

"I thought not," pursued the stranger, with a smile. "And you are not acquainted with the Frenchman they have with them?"

"No, I never heard of him before," answered Slote, "but the Allens are friends of mine. Don't think me impertinent if I ask you what business it is of yours to ask me these questions?"

The stranger laughed, and for an answer took from out his hip pocket a small glass bottle. With both hands he covered its contents.

"There's a story inside that bottle. Would you like to hear it?" he asked.

Not knowing whether he was dealing with a lunatic, an inventor or a detective, Slote resolved to humour his compagnon de voyage, and replied that it would give him great pleasure to listen to what he had to say.

"I am the traveller and buyer for a large diamond-importing house," said the stranger. "My name is Lewis. About a year ago I was in Paris on business for the house I represent.

"You must know that we diamond men, who carry so many thousands of pounds' worth of precious stones about our persons, are objects of interest to criminals that play for big game and make diamond men a special study.

"A great deal of 'body' smuggling is indulged in by foreign buyers, especially those that are 'in touch' with the Customs. I never trust stones off my person when travelling. As it is, at this moment, young man, I am lined throughout with stuff—to be declared, of course, duty to be paid; for it is a regular consignment I have with me.

"Well, a little over a year ago I was in Paris, and feeling as gay as that gay capital. I'd done a good stroke or two, and was leaving for Havre the next morning to take the steamer for home.

Digitized by Google

"I thought one parting drink of Paris life was what I needed, so I sallied forth that night loaded down with my stuff, as was my wont, a revolver in one pocket and a sharp knife in a coat-pocket cut expressly for it. There's not a hotel-safe in the world I'd trust my diamonds in. I met a number of convivial friends and drank heavily—enough to make me reckless and forget that I had over £5,000 worth of stuff on my person.

"It was in some third-class café chantant that I met one of its singers. She left me alone in an anteroom where I had gone for a quiet drink, pleading sudden indisposition. I had already doffed my very valuable overcoat and thrown it on the only available article of furniture in the room—a low divan against the wall at the farther end of the room. The only precaution I took (which was an exceedingly lucky one, as subsequent events proved) was to remove my knife and revolver from their respective pockets.

"Presently a slight, creaking noise caused me to turn my head in the direction where my overcoat lay.

"Imagine my consternation to see a hole in the wall, and a hand inserted through it in the act of lifting my very valuable garment. You may have observed that I am a very quick man in my movements. It didn't take me more than five seconds to grab revolver and knife and make for that hole in the wall.

"They must have heard me, but secure as they thought themselves (she had locked me in the room), the owner of the hand—it was a man's—was deliberately slow in gathering my coat up, so slow, that in pulling his hand out of sight, he left two fingers on the floor of my room. I both fired and swished at the hand.

"The bullet missed it, but the razor-like blade of the heavy knife did its work.

"I shall never forget his yell of pain and rage!

"When I burst open the locked door and explored the place, I found myself in an almost deserted and unfurnished house.

"The room was the only one the panel workers had fitted up.

"I hastily left the house.

"In their wild flight they had failed to close the outer door.

"Wrapped in my handkerchief were the ghastly souvenirs of the evening's entertainment—a pair of fingers.

"I have kept them in spirits, in the hope of some day meeting their owner and returning him his lost property."

The narrator paused and tossed off the cocktail the steward had placed on the table before him.

"Didn't you inform the police at once?" breathlessly inquired Slote.

"Of course not. Had the story reached the firm's ears they would have discharged me—my reckless conduct would have cost me my position."

"Well, what is this story of yours apropos of?" asked Slote, a vague suspicion astir in his mind.

"Are you acquainted with the Frenchman who knows your friends, the Allens, so well?"

"No. I answered you that question once before. I don't know where they picked him up. He poses as a cousin of the Duc de Penthièvre, the son of the Prince de Joinville, who, you know, is a descendant of Louis Phillippe, the 'citizen King.'"

"Rot," said the diamond man; "you don't believe any of that?"

"Certainly not. Do you know anything of the fellow?"

"I know that two of the fingers of his left hand are missing, and I'll bet a ruby to a rhinestone that I carry the missing fingers in the bottle I showed you."

"What?" almost screamed Slote. "Are you crazy?" he demanded, staring hard at him.

"Wait and see," was the diamond man's reply.

"What do you intend doing?" asked Slote, excitedly.

"I shall tell him the story I've just told you, and I want you to watch his face while I do. Wait till we're off quarantine and the crowd's gathered in this room celebrating the quick passage we shall have made. Can I depend upon you?"

"Here's my hand!" cried Slote, and the two men shook hands and rang for drinks.

Young Slote sat at the captain's table with the Allens, directly opposite the Baron. That night he observed the mutilated hand very closely.

Just above the knuckle of the middle stump was a slight blue mark on the flesh that looked as if made by a tattooing needle—a slight, blue discoloration that on second thought could be attributed to the effect of an explosive.

The Baron was quite popular in the smoking-room with men of sporting proclivities. He played a stiff game of poker, and made up pools on everything one could guess.

Sandy Hook was passed, and the City of Madrid lay anchored off quarantine. It was long past midnight, but the steamship's smoking-room was a blaze of light and a flood of champagne. Lewis, the diamond man, had just roared out a toast: "Gentlemen, here's to the American Eagle! May he drop feathers all over the crown of Great Britain, and wipe his feet on the lilies of France!"

The Baron and a number of Englishmen took exception to this patriotic toast. A drunken brawl was imminent.

"Gentlemen, gentlemen! my friend will apologise!" cried Slote.

Lewis made some remarks to the effect that he had quite forgotten himself in his enthusiasm at getting back home again, and volunteered to tell a rattling good story to square himself with the crowd.

"Let's have it!" they roared.

The diamond man commenced his recital. Slote leant against a table where he could command a good view of the Frenchman who sat underneath the electric light by the side of old Allen.

The Baron's face preserved a sphinx-like expression until Lewis came to that part of his story where he described the room; then the Frenchman's face grew several shades paler, and his hand sought his trouser-pocket.

"At first I thought I was dreaming, gentlemen, when I beheld the hole and saw that hand—dreaming, only dreaming. The room was dimly lighted, and, as I remarked before, there had been nothing done to arouse my suspicions."

The Baron had risen, and was about to seek the deck.

"Wait a moment, let's hear this," begged old Allen; "it's excitin'!" and he pulled him down beside him.

Slote saw huge beads of perspiration gather on the guilty wretch's forehead.

He sank limply in a heap and thrust his telltale hand deeper into his pocket.

"My £5,000 overcoat was about to disappear, but my movements were so lightning quick that I slashed the keen edge of my knife across the hand just in the nick of time. What do you think I caught with my knife?" he demanded savagely of the trembling Frenchman, who cowered behind old Allen.

The Baron vouchsafed him no reply; he was deathly white and in a half-fainting condition. All eyes were turned upon him.

"I caught the contents of this bottle," cried the diamond man, flashing it out of his pocket.

"Here!" he shouted at the top of his lungs, his excitement making his voice crack, "here are the two fingers I lopped off, and which I have since kept in spirits as a living memento, as two silent witnesses to the truth of my story."

The Baron had fainted.

"Observe," said the diamond man, recovering his usual composure, "how the restored finger meets the blue mark above the knuckle, thus completing the base of the Maltese cross that is tattooed on the finger. I don't say this is the man that tried to rob me, gentlemen," he added, very quietly, "but he's helped to make my story a realistic one."

Slote, who was bending over the prostrate form, suddenly raised his hand for silence. "He's dead!" he exclaimed. "Heart failure is convenient, sometimes."

. . . . . .

The Prefecture of Police at Paris received the following cablegram from the Central Office Detective Bureau at New York a day later, "Man arrived Madrid dead. Property recovered."

When old Allen read the account of the clever French thief's wonderful career and numerous robberies in a New York newspaper, he remarked confidentially to young Slote, that "he never again should judge a gent by his jewellery."

Digitized by Google

THE SENTRY'S STORY.

"TROFIM STOYAN," said the President of the Military Court, "you have been found guilty of the crime of aiding the escape of Prisoner No. 279 from the mine of Gorkaya-Balka. Before sentence is passed the Court desires to hear from you your version of the circumstances of the prisoner's escape, and the motives which induced you to be so false to the trust imposed on you. We understand that you dispute the correctness of some of the witnesses' statements. We warn you to speak the truth. Stand at attention!"

As the President finished, a slim young fellow, standing between two glittering bayonets, glanced round the spectators, drew himself up to attention, and faced the Court.

"Go on," said the President.

"Your Excellency," began the soldier, "I don't want mercy, and I don't look for it; but you have asked me to tell the truth, and I tell it. It was a Saturday night, snowing hard, and bitterly cold. Sergeant Petroff marched me up to the Gorkaya-Balka mine, and I relieved the sentry on duty there. I was to remain on duty until midnight, and I received the usual orders to stop anyone who attempted to enter or leave the gallery, and to shoot them if they persisted. I was shivering with cold, and kept tramping about in front of the entrance to keep warm. A little after the barrack clock had struck ten I noticed that there was someone crouching in the shadow of the old tool-house—a woman, I thought. It seemed to be darker there than out in the open. The snow was driving in my face. I felt queer and timid that night.

"Turning sharply round at the end of my beat furthest from the tool-house, I saw approaching me the figure of a woman, dressed all in black. I got opposite the entry into the gallery, and stood still. I don't know why I felt scared. There was no one else about, or nearer than the overseer's house. She came swiftly over the snow, and her face was covered with a veil. She came right up to me and threw back her veil. I couldn't speak; it was as if my tongue was frozen. She put her hands on my shoulders and looked up into my face."

"What was she like?" demanded the President.

"Your Excellency, I cannot describe her. I only saw her eyes then, and they were on fire and went right through me. She told me much that I cannot recall, for I was looking, not listening. But at last I understood her to be talking of her brother in the mine. She said she had come all through the snow from Russia to see him, and that he was dying. She said, if I would let her into the mine for a few minutes she would always pray for me, and devote her whole life to making me happy. Her great black eyes bewitched me, and I believed her. I said nothing, but pointed to the mine, and in a moment she had fled into the dark opening to the gallery.

"I never thought of what I was doing. I was dazed, and stood stock still; and the snow kept falling all the time, and the night was growing darker. I had my eyes fixed on the entrance and saw the figure emerge and run towards me.

"'Soldier,' she said, 'you have made me happy for life; make yourself happy and fly with us. Let my brother pass. I will lead you and him to a place I know of where we will all be happy together. Be good to me, soldier, and I will give you all you ask from me. I'll be yours. I'll live for you, and die for you.'

"Don't smile, Excellency. I was intoxicated with her words. I believed her. Her arms were round my neck, and her face was lovely as the Madonna's. I seized my rifle and flung it with all my strength out into the snow. She put a file into my hands, and I followed her into the gallery. There the darkness was thicker still, but we groped our way to where a man stood chained to a thick wooden stanchion. I knew what to do. The man said nothing, but the woman kissed me; kissed me, Excellency. So I worked like a madman. He was soon freed. We reached the entrance as the barrack clock was striking eleven. There was a whole hour yet before the guard would be changed. We ran through the little wood and crossed the frozen river; and away beyond a wide open space, where the snow was very deep, we entered the pine woods. The woman knew where she was leading us, for we came to a little hut, where we found clothes and food. I buried my uniform in the snow.

"All that night we moved rapidly through the woods, hardly speaking to one another at first. But the man and woman went on in front, walking arm-in-arm, and often they kissed one another, laughing and crying in turns. When I was close to them they sometimes spoke French. As soon as it was a little lighter, I never let my eyes leave her face. Her eyes were large and dark, and her hair was like gold, and hung down her back wet on her black shouba."

"Stand at attention!" said the President, sharply.

The prisoner stood erect again, and resumed—

"The morning was clear and frosty. The man had fallen several times during the night. His strength was gone. I saw he was as pale as death, and blood oozed from his mouth. The woman grew frantic with fear that he would be caught. The man, however, could go no further. He lay down on the snow, just as we were leaving the woods and coming out on the steppe. I thought he would have died.

"I took him in my arms and carried him. I carried him verst after verst, until my own strength was all gone, and I felt fever come over me. But the woman never noticed me, and once or twice when I turned to look at her from under my burden, I saw that her eyes were fixed on the face of the man I carried. I could hold out no longer. I fell on the snow and fainted. How long I lay there I cannot say. Whether or not I dreamt I am unable to tell the Court. I don't think it could have been a dream. I thought I saw a troika come noiselessly over the snow, and heard the breathing of horses."

The President interrupted. "Do you mean to tell the Court this was a dream? Can you give no further particulars about the troika or its driver?"

"No, your Excellency; the horses were black, I thought, and I know their eyes shone brightly; the sledge also seemed to be black. It came silently, it went away with gently ringing bells, like silver bells. When I came to my senses it was again snowing fast. The wet flakes wakened me, I think. I gazed around me on all sides. I was alone. I thought of my dream. There were no hoof-marks, no traces of sledge-runners, nothing but the level, trackless snow. Perhaps the snow had filled up the track, perhaps—perhaps there was some other reason.

"Your Excellency, I felt myself forsaken. I could not understand it. I was mad, and cried aloud. Suddenly I noticed, pinned to my coat, a scrap of paper with pencil writing on it. It was taken from me when I gave myself up, but I'll never forget the words: 'We cannot take you with us further. Save yourself as best you can. My husband and I will always pray for you.' Oh, Excellency, I saw it all then, and sat down in the snow and wept. I loved that woman. Yes; I was a fool."

"And a traitor," interrupted the President.

"And a traitor, if your Excellency says so; but I did not think of that then. I thought only of my love, of how I had been betrayed, of the wound to my pride. Your Excellency knows the rest."

"The sentence of the Court is that Private Trofim Stoyan take the place of the escaped Prisoner No. 279 in the mine at Gorkaya-Balka. He will remain there during the pleasure of His Imperial Majesty."

That evening he was chained to the stanchion.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SUMMER HEAT AND OBESITY.

Summer with its sultry heat, is not a source of unmixed pleasure to those who suffer from excessive corpulence. Health cannot be maintained under conditions of great obesity. In general the mental energy of the highly corpulent becomes impaired, and their capacity for the conduct of business is consequently much diminished. Our readers will therefore be interested to know it is an indisputable fact that excessive corpulency can, in all cases, be cured by the system which has now for many years been successfully practised by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Mr. Russell possesses hundreds of testimonials from persons in all classes of society, many of them holding distinguished positions in the learned professions and in Her Majesty's services, which, taken collectively, prove to a demonstration that anyone suffering from obesity who systematically applies his remedy for a few weeks consecutively can be cured. The patients under his treatment are not asked to be "fasting men"; and it is remarkable that in the case of many of Mr. Russell's subjects their appetite increases as their weight diminishes. A book (256 pages) entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," containing most interesting and trustworthy information, together with the recipe, may be had by writing to Mr. Russell, enclosing 4d. stamps for postage. With such a remedial agent at their command as Mr. Russell's specific, excessively corpulent persons have only themselves to blame if their unwieldy persons are not speedily reduced to fitting proportions.—Extract from a Leading Journal.

TO METAMORPHOSE FAT PERSONS

"We were reading in the Penny Illustrated Paper how to reduce obesity, wherein it says in that very excellent publication: 'The corpulent will be glad to learn how to lose two stone in about a month with benefit to health, strength, and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular fact that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state with increased activity of brain, digestive, and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto; yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one to two pounds daily, as the weighing machine will prove. The Book, "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), containing the "recipe," can be had gratis from Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., by sending cost of postage, fourpence.' He has discovered a simple herbal remedy, most pleasant to the taste, which entirely disposes of the necessity of starving oneself in endeavouring to be rid of all superfluous matter. An interesting point, which goes to prove that the almost magical compound is beyond doubt harmless, is that in prescribing it in a tentative way to lean persons, or rather to those who carry no superfluity of fat beyond that which is required as fuel for Nature's furnace, the medicine is absolutely inoperative, attacking only that unhealthy, disease-creating waste accumulation which is the burden of the fat creature's existence. In many cases where people take decoctions reputed to be new medical discoveries to cure some specific disease, they may recover by the action of the medicine, or Nature may have effected her own cure. In the case of corpulency, if a simple remedy undertakes to reduce a person, say, 7 lb. in a week, all that one has to do is to get weighed, and thus prove it conclusively. So it is with Mr. Russell's compound, but he asks you to prove it in twenty-four hours only."—Coventry Standard, January 18, 1895.

Digitized by Google

BETWEEN INCOME AND OUTGO.

TRY to fancy this, now. You and I are standing side by side in some country place, on the shore or margin of a little pond. At one end of this pond there is an inlet, at the other an outlet. The water runs in, the water runs out, equally, evenly. The constant gain, the constant loss—with the pond—the product of both, lying quiet between. So Nature balances all things, only you don't observe it.

Well, you say, what of it? Very much of it as you will see if you read on a bit further. Here, for example, is a trifle of personal history told by a lady whose name will be found at the end of it. It is a story of pain at first. We name this so you can drop it now if you don't like such tales. But you would better go on with it.

She says she has—or had up to a certain date—suffered all her life from illness. Her feelings were the same as the feelings of millions—your own for aught we can tell. She felt tired, weary, and heavy. Her mind was burdened also, as if some coming evil had cast its shadow before. Her skin was sallow, and the whites of her eyes turned yellow. She had an abiding sense of sickness at the stomach, pain in the right side, and spat up a watery fluid. She had no desire for food, and when (as must be) she took any it seemed to cause pain, and tightness at the chest, and under the shoulder-blades.

This was often so bad that the poor woman actually regarded her meals with terror, as though bread and meat were deadly poisons, instead of being among the most precious gifts of God; so for days together she fasted through fear of them.

From this came weakness, of course, we see. She could hardly pull herself upstairs, and her breathing was short and laboured. After a little she got nervous and irritable, and trembled and shook all over, so she says, and we believe it easily enough. At night, when we all ought to be sound asleep and sweetly dreaming, this woman tossed and tumbled on her bed. There was no gentle spirit to seal her lids, and so she felt more tired in the morning than when she lay down hours before. Time ticked along and brought no comfort nor betterment. She took medicines, lots of them, but couldn't point to any good they did. Doctors? To be sure. It's always that way. The doctors have the first chance to show what they can do. "I consulted several doctors," says the lady. Did they help her? They should; it's their business. Alas, however!

In this case they failed, as they so often fail. "They gave me no relief," she tells us. Why not?

Her narrative concludes thus: "On August 18th, 1887, whilst living at Wakefield Street, Gray's Inn Road, I went to the Royal Free Hospital and was under treatment there for six weeks. Afterwards, in 1888, I attended the Waterloo Road Hospital as an outdoor patient for two months. Several doctors there said I was suffering from liver complaint, but their physic did not do me the slightest good.

"In this condition I continued until August, 1889, when I made my first trial of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. The first bottle relieved me, and I kept on taking it. Soon my food agreed with me, and I knew no more sickness or nervousness. My spirits were good and I felt better than ever I did in my life. From that time I have had no return of my old complaint. I will gladly answer any inquiries.—Yours truly, (Signed) (Mrs.) Annie Palmer, 9, Lambeth Palace Road, London, S.E., July 18th, 1892." Wife of Mr. George Palmer, Grocer and Provision Dealer.

One word more about that pond. The human body is like it, being composed of, and sustained by, the food we eat. When the food is properly digested, and the useless portions carried away through the organs of outlet, we are in health. When either fails we fall ill and may die. This failure is indigestion and dyspepsia. It was Mrs. Palmer's ailment which the doctors treated in vain and Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup cured. This medicine helps Nature to restore her lost equilibrium, leaving the body safe and strong between its income and its outgo.

Digitized by Google

STORIES OF ALL SORTS FOR ALL PEOPLE.

SHORT STORIES

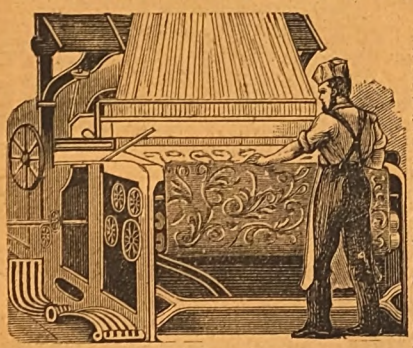
EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 341. FOR WEEK ENDING JULY 13, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

BE SURE TO CUT

IT MAY THIS OUT.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY.



THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of SHORT STORIES only. On receipt of this advertisement, accompanied by Postal Order for 6s. or 74 stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our genuine SEAMLESS, WOVEN REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., handsomely bordered, and woven in thirty different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and LARGE ENOUGH TO COVER ANY ORDINARY SIZED ROOM. These Carpets are manufactured from a material equal in wear to wool, and are undoubtedly the cheapest in the world.

With every Carpet we shall ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send two CARPETS and Two RUGS for 10s. 6d.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness, they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen" Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value."

Thousands of Testimonials similar to the following, and Repeat Orders have been received from our customers.

"16, Clarendon Villas, "West Brighton.

"DEAR SIR,—I beg to thank you for your prompt attention to my wire of Friday. The Carpet came duly to hand on Saturday, and I am exceedingly pleased with it, so much so that I purpose calling at your warehouse one day this week, when I expect to be in town, to see if I can supply myself with two more to suit my present requirements. Yours faithfully, W. HEATH HAYWOOD."

"45, George Street, Plymouth.

"GENTLEMEN,—The Carpet is duly to hand, and gives entire satisfaction.—Yours truly, J. C. PICKFORD."

"Mullaghmore.

"I beg to acknowledge receipt of Carpets, with which I am very pleased; they are splendid value for the money, and far superior to what I expected. Later on I shall be pleased to favour you with further orders.—Yours sincerely, H. CUNNINGHAM."

This offer is made to the readers of this paper only, and may not be repeated. All orders despatched same day as received. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "Union Bank," and made payable to J. HARGREAVES, Sec. Established 1872. Address—

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.,
31, OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

NOT APPEAR AGAIN.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

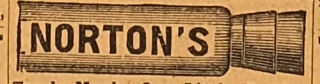
The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S, LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.



Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

1 RISING SUN STOVE POLISH. EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD.

N In HALF the TIME with HALF the LABOUR you can produce MORE POLISH with TWO Penny Packets of RISING SUN than with HALF-DOZEN of ordinary Blacklead. B

Sold in ½d., 1d. & 2d. Packets

THREE GREAT BOONS

3 MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS GLOSS, BORAX, GUM, WAX, &c. &c.

REQUIRES no addition or preparation.
SAVES time, labour, and uncertainty.
PRODUCES beautiful white glossy linen.
Sold in 1d. Packets, or 3d. and 6d. Boxes.

Sample of any one post free 2 stamps
C. Chancellor & Co., London, E.C.

2 RISIN' SUN METAL POLISH. GIVES TO ALL KINDS OF METALS A BEAUTIFUL SOFT BRILLIANT POLISH.

With the MINIMUM of LABOUR this LIQUID POLISH produces a MOST BRILLIANT APPEARANCE, which lasts much longer than that produced by any Paste Polish.

Sold in 1d, 3d, 6d, & 1/- Bottles

Digitized by Google

TOO STOUT.

Prof. Holt's "H.D." Pills for Fat People.

A rapid, permanent, and absolutely safe reduction, averaging 5 lbs. weekly, with improved Health and Figure, and without dietary restriction, guaranteed to all (either sex). Will reduce weight and cure corpulency in the most stubborn cases where other treatments have failed. They are small, entirely vegetable, agreeable, harmless, and highly recommended. Price, post free, plain wrapper, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box. —Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
Gothic House, 9, Erskine Street, Liverpool.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. Herbal Institute, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

RUBBER STAMPS

Free by Post.

AGENTS WANTED

Liberal commissions.

Your Monogram, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd., 92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms. two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free. Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

Ottey's Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

EMPLOYMENT FOR LADIES!

Ladies possessing a type-writer can qualify themselves at home in three to six months as expert typists, and £2 upwards weekly may be realised anywhere by competent lady operators owning a type-writing machine. We specially invite young ladies to write at once for lowest cash prices of some of our first-class intruments. Remingtons, Yosts, Caligraphs, Bar-locks, and all the leading makes of type-writers supplied at enormous reductions from manufacturers' prices. Tuition Gratis. Every machine guaranteed. Numerous testimonials. Apply for further particulars to the Standard Type-Writer Depôt, 4, Grosvenor Street, Hanley. Manager, Thomas Large.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES.

Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science: they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

TO INVENTORS.

An Invention Protected for £1. Handbook, "How to Patent an Invention," giving full particulars, forms, &c., free from Hughes & Young, "Patent Editors" to the principal newspapers, 23, Coleman Street, London, E.C. Established 1829. Inventors assisted in working or selling Inventions. Read "Patents."

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. Holt, (Rooms O), Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

New Harrison. Swift Gold Medal.

KNITTER

KNITS STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" & "SUN" Machines.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker.

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

TOOTH-ACHE CURED INSTANTLY BY BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(really genuine)

in patent air-tight tins—½lb., 1s. 2d.; 1 lb., 2s.; 2 lbs., 3s. 9d., including tin and postage.

Mrs. CONYERS,
Kilkhampton, Shalton, N. Devon.

HAIR DESTROYED

Root and Branch absolutely exterminated without injury to the skin, entirely new treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms.

Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticisms, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. Horn, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

OVER 2,000 New and Secondhand. Easy Terms

—From 10s. per month. Lists (200 page) and Testimonials post free. British Cycle Manufacturing Co., Liverpool; 45, Everton Road, and 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W. (close to Euston Road).

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

All communications relating to the Advertisement Spaces in this Publication should in future be addressed to the Advertisement Manager,

"SHORT STORIES," PEARSON'S WEEKLY BUILDINGS, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

ADVERTISERS should write for Particulars of the positions available. Announcements carefully designed and displayed.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 341.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 13, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

A DELICIOUS freshness pervaded the woods. The sparrows flitted in and out among the branches, and sang to one another their sweetest songs. On a projecting bough a finch had comfortably settled himself, and was whistling with the utmost nonchalance the sole number contained in the poor rascal's répertoire.

It was a rare delight, indeed, to wander through this natural loveliness after leaving, scarcely two hours before, the stifling atmosphere of a railway-carriage; and the pathway, through which I loitered in happiest mood, was a narrow one. The highway, indeed, would have conducted me more quickly to the desired haven, but on this most magnificent summer day I very naturally chose the longer walk through one of the most beautiful bits of forest in the neighbourhood.

Suddenly the sunshine glinted more brightly through the trees. It must be that I was approaching a clearing, and, in truth, a few more steps brought me to an open place, which spread itself out like an island in the heart of the wood. Near the edge of the clearing knelt a man who was industriously filling a sack. Could it be earth that he was scooping up—and for what purpose?

I stole nearer. That which the man was gathering was the peculiar nest of the wood ant, cunningly put together from bits of plants and pine needles. All this the man put into a wire sieve, through which the ants and their white larvæ fell into the sack.

"Good success?" said I, with friendly greeting.

The ant-hunter looked up, and pushed back a little his old felt hat. Then he said: "It will do, sir. There isn't anybody in the neighbourhood who cares to be a rival in the business."

"Indeed! Has anyone any objection to it?"

"Hm! yes. The work makes one look so!" said the ant-hunter, and his eyes ran over his own shabby exterior.

He wore a dirty and ragged brown coat, was bare-footed, and pressed upon his frowsy head was a crumpled hat of doubtful colour. Between his teeth he held a short pipe, the rudely fantastic head of which he might have carved himself. The old stump must have been the dearest thing he called his own, for even when he spoke it did not leave his lips.

I had never before seen an ant-hunter, although he is a characteristic feature of the Alps, so I sat down upon the stump of a tree to watch him at his work.

"You won't see anything very remarkable," said he, shaking the sieve. "My work is simple enough."

He spread out a linen cloth, fastened down its four corners with wooden pins, and surrounded the whole with pine branches. Then he took the sack and shook its contents out upon the cloth. Immediately the lively little creatures seized their babies, and sought to hide them among the sheltering twigs. Thereupon the ant-hunter carefully brushed these twigs with a coarse rag, and the ants remained hanging to the twigs, while the larvæ lay clearly distinguishable upon the cloth spread out below.

"My crop is gathered for to-day," said he, thrusting his booty into the sack.

"And does this business bring you in a living?" I asked.

"Oh! it'll do. The dealers pay me pretty well, and the amount I need for my living——" He did not finish the sentence, but a sad smile flitted over his face.

While his work had been going on, his pipe had gone out, and he drew out now a closely-tied tobacco pouch. It was empty. I could see that the old man was greatly disappointed, and that after his hard work he had counted upon this modest enjoyment. Help, however, was at hand; for although no smoker myself, I always carry tobacco with me on these mountain excursions. It is an "open sesame" when even the jingle of coin is ineffectual—no Alpine shepherd can resist it. Such a packet I took from my pocket now, and opening it, offered it to the ant hunter.

"Here is some. Try it, and see if it suits you."

What had I done? The man stood as though transfixed, his eyes staring. A shudder ran through his body.

"Sir!" he burst forth, but excitement would not let him proceed further.

"Take it! I beg of you," said I.

Upon this a curious change came over his countenance. A suspicious moisture appeared in his eyes. His bosom rose and fell, and involuntarily he stretched out his hand for the little packet.

"Sir," he faltered; "sir, excuse me! but it is fully twelve years since a human being has offered me a kindness."

"You—avoid people?" said I, perplexed.

"Or they me, which amounts to the same thing," said he bitterly.

I looked narrowly at him. He dropped his eyes.

"But they are right!" he went on, as if talking to himself. "It is indeed a disgrace to associate with a gaol bird!"

He stopped as though he expected me to order him off. He waited in vain, however; for, though astounded at his disclosure, I said not a word.

"Forgive me, sir," said he with surprising quietness. "The miserable business belongs to years gone by. I never like to stir it up. But as you have been so kind, I would not have you get a wrong impression of me; so listen, and despise me if you can."

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

He packed up his implements, threw his sack over his shoulder, and started on his way.

"I'm bound for S.," said I. "Are you going the same way?"

"The same, whichever way you go. I am everywhere—or rather, nowhere—at home."

We walked on, and soon entered again the magnificent wood. But its beauty found me indifferent now. I was all absorbed in the mysterious man at my side, whose eyes were fixed intently upon the mossy earth.

"You were going to tell me your story," said I, taking up the conversation where we had left off.

"I was going to—yes. But really, now, I'm almost sorry I said so. However, I promised, and I must keep my word—for, somehow, you're different from the rest."

He struck a match and lighted his pipe, which he had already filled with my tobacco.

"One would never think, to look at me now," said he, after a few pulls at his pipe, "that I was the son of a rich farmer. Ah! truly, time can do strange things with men. My father—blessed be his memory!—was wrong when he so often said, nearly thirty years ago, that his wild boy wouldn't live to see many years. I've seen only too many of them!

"There was my brother Xavier—an entirely different sort of fellow—my exact opposite. While I wandered the whole day long in the woods, he would sit poring over books thick with dust even in our grandfather's day, which he found in the garret. In the catechism he stood at the head. The pastor had not met so industrious a boy in years.

"And I? Oh! I was good for nothing, who deserved a whipping every day. I got it often enough, too, and it didn't agree so badly with me either, for I grew to be such a big fellow as couldn't be matched in the neighbourhood.

"I think at one time there wasn't a village fair in the vicinity where I didn't play the rowdy. This would have been a pretty bad state of affairs if it had lasted long, but an end soon came to it—an end which I would gladly have exchanged for an honest stab in a public-house brawl. It happened thus:

"Can you see, sir, that old tumble-down hut over there, between those two firs? Twelve years ago that was the home of an old day-labourer. It is easy to be seen that wealth had no place there; but the house was kept by Marie, the old man's daughter, a girl so pretty that the angels in heaven might have rejoiced to look at her. What wonder was it that I often stopped to chat with her over the fence, or fasten a nosegay in her bodice, on my way home?

"Marie, the old man's daughter.

"Well, the summer passed away; and when winter came on, raw and cold, and I had no excuse for wandering among the mountains, still something drew me irresistibly to those old paths, and I could not let a single day go by without seeing Marie.

"Her father saw how matters were going, but he made no objections; for while he knew that I was a wild sort of a scamp, he did not believe there was anything really bad in me. And he was not mistaken.

"The time came at last when I must acquaint my father with the state of affairs. Oh! but you should have seen, sir, the storm it raised! It had never entered into my lovesick brain that Marie was the daughter of a poor peasant! The old man was stubborn, and I equally so. For six weeks I did not sit down to a meal with him. Xavier, in the meanwhile, was all devotion. And he was right—my noble brother!—for was I not making my choice between Marie and my share of the property?

"Just then it seemed as if heaven itself meant to spoil his calculations. The dreaded day for the military draft came on. I had the year before drawn the lucky number which exonerated me from service. It was now Xavier's turn to try the wheel of Fortune.

"He drew a blank—and, unless a substitute should be provided, he must within a few days join the army.

"My father was inconsolable. A substitute was no easy thing to obtain, especially as the very air seemed full of ominous portents, and any day might come the news that war had been declared.

"A thought flashed through my mind. I swallowed my pride on the instant, and once more entered the old man's presence.

"'Father,' said I, 'if you will give your consent to my marriage with Marie, I will be Xavier's substitute.'

"Three days later, I was wearing the Kaiser's uniform."

The ant-hunter stopped for an instant, and looked about him in silent admiration.

"It is a beautiful little bit of earth—this fatherland," he went on to say, "and I have always loved it. My grandfather gave his life for it. He was killed in the year 1809 in a battle with the French. He little dreamt, good man, that a grandson of his would cover his untarnished name with disgrace, and, shut up in a fortress as a cowardly betrayer of his prince, curse the day that ever he was born!

"And can you imagine, sir, who brought me there? A miserable rascal! The offscouring of humanity!—may the earth swallow him up! By heaven! I was not bad, but they were bound to have me so, and the one who can most congratulate himself on his success is no other than Xavier—my precious brother Xavier!

"It was not enough that he had robbed me of my father's heart; he must take from me that for which I had sacrificed my freedom.

"Through what treachery he managed it I could never find out. Suffice it to say, I had been scarcely six months in the army, when a fellow from my native village did me the friendly service to tell me that the names of Xavier and Marie had been called out three times from the altar.

"At first I only ridiculed the idea, but later I was convinced that it was only too true.

"Do you see that blade of grass there, sir? Whichever way the wind blows strongest, that way it blows—a picture of a woman's heart! From that day I lost my faith in humanity.

"Oh, but it was a fearful blow to me! I thought I was going to lose my mind. Only one thing seemed plain to me. I must see the miserable pair, and avenge myself.

"The day on which they were to be married, I was on my way home. I had asked for no furlough; I had thought of none. All unwittingly I had become a deserter.

"At last I was within sight of my goal. Already I could hear the church bells ringing, and shuddered at their tones. They were the funeral knell of my fool's happiness. Oh, how I longed for wings! Perhaps I could get there yet, and stop this horrible thing, and then—but no! strength failed me. My limbs were like lead, and only with difficulty could I drag myself along.

"When I reached the church I was too late. The bridal procession was just coming out. I can see them now as if it had happened only yesterday. Oh, that a thunderbolt had fallen from heaven and transfixed them all! But, ah! no. The sun up there shone brighter than ever, the birds sang in the great linden trees, and underneath them the village musicians struck up a lively waltz.

Digitized by Google

"It was as if everything had conspired together to mock me. I could bear it no longer. In a rage, I picked up a stone from the road and dashed towards Xavier. One shriek, then another—and then all was still."

"You killed him?" said I, horrified.

"Killed him!—A fortnight later I found myself imprisoned in a fortress. To-day, by particular favour of the Kaiser, I am again free—a ragged ant-hunter. And Xavier? Do you see, sir, that big house over there? It is the finest in the neighbourhood. There my brother lives with his wife and several children. Behold the righteous reward which Heaven metes out! Can one be surprised that I have lost my faith?"

The ant-hunter pressed his hat low upon his forehead, gruffly bade me good-bye, then struck into the path among the bushes on our left which led over a stony hillside to an isolated farmhouse, where he hoped, without doubt, to dispose of his curious wares.

Lost in thought, I picked my way along the rough path to the village, whose church steeples were reflected in every direction by the glowing rays of the sun, which, in its setting, looked like a magnificent carbuncle.

Slowly and laboriously the dark shadows climbed from the valley up the mountain. But no sweet, refreshing breeze announced the approach of evening. A sultry oppressive heat hung over the entire region, and a black cloud, like a chariot drawn by invisible horses, came up in the farthest west as the advance guard of a menacing storm.

S—— is one of those pretty little villages which these high mountains hide by the hundred among their valleys. Its largest building, next to the church, is its tavern, which offers the friendliest of hospitality.

As I entered the public room in my easy-going manner, the lamp was burning. By a corner table sat several peasants, with their beer mugs before them. I stepped past them towards an open window and looked out.

It had already grown very dark, and the whole heavens, as far as the eye could reach, were enveloped in black, dangerous-looking clouds. Every now and then there would be a bright flash on the farthest horizon where the mountain peaks kissed the clouds, and then would come a response in low, heavy growls from unfathomable abysses.

Scarcely ten minutes later a wild hurricane was in full blast. Heavy drops fell pattering upon the ground. Lightning flashes came thick and fast; and from the church tower pealed forth the storm bell.

The bar-room door creaked on its hinges, and a man, bent and dripping with rain, appeared within it. Without a word, he stepped in, and retired quickly to a dark corner. It was the ant-hunter.

The landlady sat by the stove and knitted. Only from time to time, as an especially blinding flash would shoot across the heavens, would she let her work fall in her lap and make quickly the sign of the cross. She had indeed noticed the new guest, but evidently did not think him worthy of a second glance.

"A dram!" said the ant-hunter roughly. The landlady went on with her knitting.

"A dram!" came more violently from the corner. That took effect. Slowly the woman got up; more leisurely than was necessary she went to the cupboard, and finally placed, with scant courtesy, the desired liquor before her guest. The latter looked at her in a curiously mocking way.

"Aren't you glad to see me?" said he. "I have the same right to sit here as the others. I pay my bills."

At the table where the peasants sat, there had been a great commotion ever since the arrival of the ant-hunter. There was much putting of heads together, very animated whispering, and an industrious passing about of the pitcher.

"Landlady!" finally cried the principal speaker of the company, a broad-shouldered, thick-set man, "the pitcher is empty. If you want to fill it again, please to notice that we're not going to sit in the same room with a gaol bird."

The ant-hunter shrank at the tones of his voice.

"Xavier!" he faltered.

The man so designated caught the word, and, with flushed face, and holding his oaken stool in his hand, took a few steps forward.

"Now," said he, trembling with excitement, "there is the door!"

The ant-hunter had risen. He seemed strangely calm.

"Xavier," said he, "you are giving yourself unnecessary trouble. Your scorn no longer irritates me. Once have I raised my hand against you in revenge, but I ought not to have done it. Now I am waiting until the hour itself comes."

A blinding light flooded the whole room. Then came a fearful clap. The windows rattled. With a shriek, the landlady sprang up, and all rushed to the window.

"That struck!" said the ant-hunter, and sat quietly down again.

Outside, deepest darkness reigned. In vain did we seek to pierce it. Suddenly, a column of fire mounted to heaven; the whole village was as light as day.

"O God! my farm buildings!" cried Xavier, burying his face in his hands.

"I believe the hour is here!" said the ant-hunter, and emptied his glass.

From the towers sounded again the storm bells. Gruesome were the shrill tones as they rang through the darkness of the night.

"Fire! Fire!" was next heard through the village, and the startled people ran hither and thither in the wildest excitement. Windows were thrown open, doors creaked on their hinges, and everybody rushed towards the wooded ridge, from the foot of which a mighty pyramid of flame rose towards the sky.

Shrieking and crying, the frightened women and children begged their husbands and fathers not to expose themselves to danger.

But their alarm was groundless. They had nothing to fear from that scene of horror. Not a finger was lifted to bring help to that stricken home. God Himself had hurled the thunderbolt, and where He kindles the fire—so it is related shudderingly from generation to generation of the peasant folk—billows of water are powerless to extinguish it.

Idly, therefore, stood hundreds of people before the finest farmhouse in the valley, and gazed with impotent horror into the flames which would soon engulf it.

Placed . . . the desired liquor before her guest.

Digitized by Google

With dishevelled locks, and wild despair in his eyes, Xavier appeared now and then and threw out whatever came to his hand, howsoever worthless it might be.

The wretched man had lost his senses. A group of women had gathered about the well, and in their midst lay the farmer's wife, who had dropped down there utterly exhausted from fright and excitement. She had been with the children in the house when the lightning struck the adjoining barn and set it on fire. When she flew from the house, the rafters were already ablaze.

The women were bathing her head with the fresh well-water when she opened her eyes and looked anxiously about.

"Friedel, Lorie!" she cried, and, with the words, pressed the sobbing children to her breast.

"Merciful Heaven! My little Tony!" she suddenly shrieked, springing to her feet. "He lies up there in his cradle, and will be burned to death!"

Horror held the bystanders spell-bound. It was heartrending to see the poor mother in her despair. It did not seem possible for a human being to offer help. Already the flames were bursting from the windows. Even Xavier had been forced to desist from his labours. With singed hair and clothing he appeared now in the doorway.

"My baby! My baby! Save my baby!" moaned the mother, wringing her hands.

"He lives."

No one stirred. Any attempt would have been foolhardy.

"Give me my child, or I shall die!" she cried again, and rushed herself towards the scorching, fiery furnace as if to snatch her darling from its depths. Just then a heavy hand was laid upon her shoulder, holding her back.

"Don't do that, Marie," she heard a rough voice say. "You have made me a criminal, now I will take my revenge."

An icy chill ran through my veins at these words. It was the ant-hunter who spoke.

"Joseph! Good heavens! Would you kill my child?" cried the mother, and in her desperation she clung about his knees.

Quick as lightning the ant-hunter pushed her from him and rushed himself into the billowing flames. A cry of horror burst from all who saw him. The unhappy man had voluntarily gone to his death. Any instant the rafters might fall in, and if he were not suffocated with the smoke they would bury him in their ruins.

A few breathless, horrible moments went by. Silently all eyes were fixed upon the fire-wreathed windows; when, suddenly, there appeared at the top one a figure holding a black object high in his hands.

"Catch it!" sounded from above. Twenty hands were stretched into the air, and caught the cradle which the ant-hunter dropped down to them.

A low whimpering issued from it.

"He lives!" were the joyful words that rang from the heart of the mother.

"He lives!" fell with a hollow sound from the window above; and the whole house, with a fearful crash and tumble, seemed to repeat the words.

The handsome farmhouse disappeared as if by magic, and in its place a charred ruin yawned horribly.

"Joseph!" shrieked the farmer's wife, bethinking herself of the rescuer of her child.

All was still.

"He is avenged!" said I, half aloud, and turned away to hide my tears.

MILTON'S TRANCE.

It was ten years ago that the facts occurred of which I am about to tell you. I was then a young fellow of eight-and-twenty, and I had an office and growing practice in London. My patients were all of the wealthier class, and, as a rule, very highly educated. By my constant intercourse with this class of people I obtained an insight into, and information about, subjects to which I had formerly never given any attention. I also made many acquaintances, who were valuable helps to me, both in an intellectual and professional way.

One of these acquaintances was a young lawyer, who had a fair practice, notwithstanding the fact that he had been in London for less than a year. Perhaps, as my story concerns him, a brief description of him will not go amiss. He was rather tall, of a commanding figure, and was what you would call a handsome young fellow. But the most striking thing about him, and that which invariably attracted a stranger's attention, was his eyes. They were piercingly black, large and brilliant, and, when he looked at you, he seemed to read your very thoughts. He was well educated, and a good conversationalist.

His one hobby, however, was hypnotism, and, as I was much interested in the matter myself, we made our investigations and experiments together. One evening he entered my office, where I was busy at my desk, and said rather excitedly, "I have just made a discovery. I possess the hypnotic power!"

I at once became greatly interested, and asked him to give me an example of his newly-acquired power. He agreed to do it, and, calling my attention to my office cat, which was asleep by the fire, he bade me watch his experiment. Fixing his eyes upon the cat, he willed her to get up. In a moment she stirred uneasily, then she rose and her eyes met his. The effect was startling. "Die," he said, in a monotonous tone of voice. "Die, die, die!"

The cat staggered like a drunken thing, walked a step or two, and then fell on her side. I went over and picked her up. She was dead.

"Are you satisfied?" he asked, turning to me with a smile on his face.

"Perfectly," I replied.

There was nothing very marvellous in it to me, as I had seen others make people and animals do their every wish, but I had never seen anyone sap the entire life out of a creature as he had done, and I knew that he possessed the hypnotic power to a degree that was startling.

Long into the night we discussed his power, so lately discovered, and I proposed a plan by which he might do some experimenting, and aid me in my practice at the same time. I knew that he was about to take a holiday for two months, and I suggested that he should give up going away, and enter my employ as an aid. I would then give him a chance to operate upon my patients in the case of amputation and painful operations, when I should otherwise be obliged to use chloroform or ether.

He fell in with the idea eagerly, and the next week entered my employ as an assistant. Whenever there was a painful operation to perform, Kegerly first hypnotised the patient, and then I would perform it. The knowledge that he possessed such a power was, of course, a secret, for it would never have done to have had it known that I was employing such a power in my practice. We had wonderful success in working together. In every case he controlled the patient beautifully while in the hypnotic trance.

Digitized by Google

At that time comparatively little was known of hypnotism, and we made some important discoveries in regard to it. We found that the hypnotic trance resembled sleep to a great extent, the only radical difference being that, whereas anyone can awaken a sleeping person, only the operator who puts the person in a trance can awaken him; also that sometimes breathing was imperceptible.

One night we were both seated in my office, when there came a summons for me to go at once to the house of a rich M.P. named Milton. The messenger simply knew that his master had met with a bad accident. Not knowing how serious it might be, I told Kegerly to get ready and accompany me. We drove to the house, and then I found that Milton had fallen from his horse while riding and sustained a compound fracture of his right leg.

The operation of setting the broken limb would be one of extreme pain; therefore, when we three were alone in the room, I told Kegerly to hypnotise him. Milton succumbed in an instant, much to our surprise, as it usually took from one to three minutes to put a patient in a trance.

"Your power must be unusually strong to-night," I remarked to Kegerly.

"I never felt it half as strong before," he replied.

I immediately went to work on our patient, and in an hour I had the leg nicely set in splints. Then I told my assistant to awaken Milton, and I started to put up a window. Just as I turned to come back, I heard Kegerly cry out, like a tortured soul, "My God! I cannot awaken him!" I jumped to Milton's side, a horrible fear besetting me, and placed my hand over his heart, My worst fears were realised; the man was stone dead.

Kegerly and I stood there and stared at each other for a few dreadful moments, during which neither spoke. The look on his face was horrible. We both realised that he had, by an over-application of his fiendish power, sapped the life out of the man before us, even as he had the life of the cat in my office.

Suddenly Kegerly started for the open window. As he reached it, he turned to me, and said, in a voice that was husky with agony: "When this is discovered, tell the whole truth; that will absolve you. As for me, I am branded with the brand of Cain; I am a murderer, but I will never be taken." As he spoke, he sprang from the window and disappeared.

My situation can be imagined. I shudder even now as I think of that moment. I had been called in to perform a simple operation, which, though painful, could not have proved fatal to any one, had I been content to employ natural methods. I realised then for the first time, in all its intensity, the wrong I had been doing in allowing such a power to be used upon my patients.

I did not dare, I could not, face the wife and children of the dead man, and tell them that I had allowed their husband and father to be murdered. For the first time in my life I was a coward.

Seizing my hat and coat, I lowered myself from the window, and passed into the street. Hailing a passing cab, I drove to the police-station, and made a clean breast of the whole affair, and implored the sergeant to send some friend of the family to break the fearful tidings. I was promptly locked up, accused of being an accessory to the crime, and spent that night in prison. What a night that was! I knew that, if I escaped sentence, my practice in London, or even anywhere in England, was ruined. I never could be anything again.

At first I thought I could not bear it, the shame, dishonour, and condemnation of my brother physicians. Then I thought of poor Kegerly, and realised that his lot was worse than mine. I paced my cell all night. Morning brought a piece of startling intelligence. A messenger hurriedly entered my cell, and told me that Milton was not dead, but in an hypnotic trance so nearly resembling death as to deceive even myself. This was a great relief to me, and threw a terrible burden off my mind.

Then came the thought, could I find or communicate with Kegerly? If he was seeking to hide himself from the consequences of his supposed crime, would he not go where he might not hear that Milton was not dead, or might he not, in his terror and despair, have committed suicide?

I was free, and went back to my office to await events. There I discovered two things—that I had but few friends, and no practice; but I made it my one object in life to find Kegerly. I put advertisements in all the papers, and I knew that, if he should chance to see one, he would come back to London.

Week after week passed, and Milton still lay in that death-like trance. It was a mystery to the profession and to the world. The papers were full of it, and it was the talk of the day. I was in my office one night, feeling discouraged in regard to ever hearing anything from Kegerly, when there came a knock at the door. I called out, "Come in!" and in response to my invitation a tall, dark-complexioned man, wearing a full beard, entered, closing and locking the door behind him.

I sprang to my feet, thinking that some trick was about to be played upon me, when he tore the false whiskers from his face. It was Kegerly. My surprise was great, but no greater than my joy, when I realised what his coming might mean to both of us.

He was greatly changed and fatigued, but he immediately told me the story of his escape. He had fled from the house that night, partially insane, donned the disguise that he now wore, and shipped in a vessel for America. They had encountered heavy storms on the way, and were a month in reaching their destination. He did not hear of the fact that Milton still lived until he had been in America two weeks. He took passage at once for England, and, on arriving in London, had come direct to my office.

"You know why I have come back," said he. "Since I was the one who put Milton in his trance, I am the only man who can bring him out of it, and perhaps I cannot, but I mean to make the attempt. If I fail—well, let the law take its course."

I thought that, as he was very tired, he had better get some rest before he made his supreme effort, for it would require immense mental power; but he said that he felt as though he could do it that night, if ever. He donned his disguise, in order that his appearance might not cause comment, and possibly some interference with our plans, and we proceeded to Milton's house.

When we arrived there, I asked to see the eldest son. To him I explained the matter, and requested him not to tell any other member of the family, as I did not wish to arouse any hopes which might possibly be vain. He admitted us to the room where his father lay, and then left us alone. The supreme moment had arrived. Kegerly stepped over to the bedside, and fixing his eyes on those closed lids of Milton, said in a low tone which showed that all the will-power of the man was thrown into his command, "Awake, awake!" at the same time striking him sharply on the breast. The eyes slowly unclosed, Milton's breath came faster and faster; he moved; he awoke to consciousness; then Kegerly, with a cry of joy, fell in a faint.

There is not much more to tell. Milton got well, and when he first awoke, he asked if we had finished setting his leg, thinking he had been asleep but an hour or so, at the most. He had slept just two months and sixteen days. One peculiar feature of this sleep was that his leg had been healing all the time, and when I removed the bandages and splints it was almost well.

Kegerly was ill for two months with nervous prostration, and upon his recovery he went to Rome, where he still practises law. I hear from him occasionally, and he writes me that never from that time has he been able to exercise any sign of hypnotic power whatever.

Digitized by Google

THE SONG, AND THE GIRL WHO SANG IT.

DOWN the street, a few yards from where the old "Anchor Inn" stood, was the tavern presided over by Mother Griffin. The building had always been a tavern. Long years before, when Apple Alley did not figure to any great extent in the metropolitan financial mind, Bacchus claimed the little two-storey place for his own. Gradually the alley passed through various stages of existence, until it finally became a nest of speculators. Money, margins, stocks, bonds, and quotations obtained a foothold in the place, and stayed there, driving out everything else but the tavern.

Mother Griffin succeeded the late priest of the shrine. Nobody seemed to know what her real name was, or where she came from. Nobody cared, for the bull and bear denizens of the alley were usually too much engrossed in the music of their tickers to think of speculating on her past. In winter, Mother Griffin served a fragrant steaming punch; in summer, a delicious, cooling draught, known as "Mother Griffin's Icebergs," went over the bar.

These were her specialities. Far and wide they became famous, to the detriment of business in the neighbouring taverns. One could get toddy at the old lady's not to be beaten, and, when summer came, the "iceberg" was like a breath from the Pole.

So the business flourished and grew apace. Finally, the exigencies of trade, and the accumulation of gold in Mother Griffin's cash-box, drove her to the extremity of securing "help." Help came in the shape of a stalwart lad who had crossed from Dublin under the name of Maurice O'Brien; but who, on his arrival, was promptly supplied with the nickname of "Shamus." After awhile Mother Griffin stopped dabbling in rum, lemons, and ice. First swearing Shamus to secrecy, she imparted to him the recipes for toddy and icebergs.

So Bacchus had his high-priestess and his assistant. The high-priestess superintended the business from the depths of a deck chair in the window corner, while she knitted grey woollen stockings of interminable length, the final fate of which never became known.

. . . . . .

Up at the Hi-diddle-diddlety Music Hall, in the heart of the Metropolis, a woman with the voice of a siren sang topical songs. She was known to fame chiefly as Merrie Maywood. Merrie was the newest thing in this line which the indefatigable manager, Bosker, had yet found. She was "the rage" with the blooded patrons of the Hi-diddle-diddlety Music Hall and "the staff," with its plebeian attendants. She was also tall, golden-haired, handsome in a semi-coarse way. But who could resist her "Drinkety-drink, boys, drink!" or "Mother, God bless you!" The first was a wild gyration of music and dance, dedicated to the great thirsty world. The second was one of the sickly-sentimental ditties which the morbid lower class catch and sing threadbare.

Of course, Merrie's fame had reached to Apple Alley. In an evil moment, Shamus, Mother Griffin's attendant spirit, yielded to temptation, and went to hear "Drinkety-drink." The lightning struck, and Shamus came home "half seas over," with a vision of gleaming gold hair and white arms before his eyes, and the memory of a witching voice in his fuddled Irish head. Oh! if it had ended there—but it didn't.

The next day Shamus whistled "Drinkety-drink, boys!" as he mixed icebergs, and hummed it as he waited for trade. By-and-bye Bosker's advertising man wandered into Apple Alley, and sought to paste up posters in its precincts. Thirst drove him to Mother Griffin's, and Fate made Shamus whistle "Drinkety-drink" as he came in.

Now Bosker's bill-sticker was a man of fine business instinct. "Barman whistles 'Drinkety-drink,'" said he to himself; "seen Merrie—likes her (couldn't help it)—good place for Merrie's mug—can see it all the time then." So he tugged out a poster and broached the matter to Shamus.

The lad hesitated—what would Mother Griffin say? No theatrical posters ever went into that big front window—she said she hated "theayters"—no good comes from 'em; she might kick—but— Here the bustling bill-poster saw Shamus hesitate. In an instant two tickets for the Hall were flashed before the Irishman's eyes.

Shamus bit, like a big Irish gudgeon. When Mother Griffin came in from her marketing, one hour later, Merrie's face smiled out from the bulk upon the hustle and bustle of the Alley, and in Shamus's inside pocket were two free passes to the Hall. Shamus nursed his tickets two days too long. On the second day after Merrie's advent in the Alley, Mother Griffin discovered the poster in the window. She looked at it for a moment, and then became ghastly pale. "Shamus," she called. Shamus was in the cellar bottling up a cask, but he answered at once, "Yes'm."

When he emerged from the depths, Mother Griffin questioned him:

"Who brought that—that picture here?" she demanded.

"A gintleman," responded Shamus, thinking of his free tickets.

"Was he one of the customers?"

"He was that," answered the witness. "He had an iceberg. He ain't a regular, though."

"Whose picture is it?"

"Bedad, the swatest gurrel in the world, mum; she sings 'Drinkety-drink, boys, drink!' up at Bosker's. Have yez heard her, mum?"

Here Shamus launched out into Merrie's praises, feeling that there was a gleam in the eyes of his mistress which required dissimulation on his part. Mother Griffin listened; but her poor old face grew even older-looking and more care-worn as Shamus went on.

"The gintleman gave me two free tickets for the show, mum, just for the honner of stickin' the thing in the windy," said he, as a finale, "and I'm going there th' night. Sure, to hear her sing 'Drinkety-drink, boys' is finer than wan of yer own icebergs."

Mother Griffin sat down in her corner, but not a stocking did she knit that day. She just sat and rocked, looking out into Apple Alley with eyes that seemed to be looking years back into the past. Once Shamus saw a tear trickle down her face and drop into her lap.

When the establishment closed for the day, at six p.m., Shamus was asked to disgorge his tickets. The Irish lad looked crestfallen for a moment, as his visions of a night at Bosker's faded away into nothingness. But a bright idea struck him.

"Yez don't want both of 'em?" he asked wistfully. "Me and Paddy Long was goin', but I can make Paddy pay."

Mother Griffin smiled sadly, and said one would do, upon which Shamus departed, thinking he had "shut up the owld lady's eye."

That night any Apple Alleyite, who chanced to be near the stage at Bosker's, might have seen an old lady, all wrapped up in a veil, seated at a table, eagerly watching the different acts. He might also have seen her get up after Merrie's turn, and stagger out of the place as if intoxicated. Inside all was applause and encore: "Drinkety-drink" held high carnival; but outside, where the big arc-lights shed their pitiless dazzle, tottered a broken-hearted old woman, whose soul was hearing a refrain as sad as Merrie's song was joyous. "Oh, if God had only taken little Mary; if He had only taken me before she was born." And, still muttering, the old lady shrank from the dawdlers round the entrance, and passed into the darkness beyond. In an hour she found Apple Alley and the tavern.

Digitized by Google

. . . . . .

When Mother Griffin came downstairs in the morning to see if Shamus had made everything ready for the day's business, she looked as if she had passed a sleepless night. Shamus—always quick to note a change in his mistress—remarked the fact, and was told that "nooralgy" had got in its work between sunset and dawn. But when the big Irishman caught Mother Griffin sobbing to herself over in the little corner where she always sat, he concluded that something beside neuralgia was to blame for those sleepless hours.

What had the old lady to worry about? Nothing, as far as he knew. Business was good; and even if it wasn't, there was a goodly pile of gold in the bank to Mother Griffin's credit. He knew that, for he had seen her bank-book. So, after the first discomforting vision of bankruptcy, the sheriff, and consequent loss of his job, Shamus gave up the idea of business troubles, and sought another cause for his mistress's tears. Towards night she gave him a surprise, equally great as the sight of her in tears.

"Shamus?" asked she, "what have you done with that other ticket for the Hi-diddle-diddlety Theatre that the man gave you?"

Here Shamus did something he had never done before—he told the old lady a lie. Afterwards, when he and Patsy Doolan sat sipping their beer in the Hi-diddle-diddlety, he excused the act to his chum by saying: "Me wages ain't so big, Pat, that Oi can affoord to lose a ticket loike thot. Oi giv' her wan av thim, and she warn't contin't, so Oi towld her Oi loosed it."

. . . . . .

So the summer wore on, and winter came. Merrie Maywood still sang at the Hall.

Down in Apple Alley things had changed a little—icebergs had resigned in favour of hot toddy Shamus was still there, hale and hearty, but Mother Griffin looked as if her days were numbered and her reign at the tavern would soon be at an end.

One day—a dreary, cold December day—when the streets were like glass under the sleet and ice of a fierce north-easter, one of the denizens of Apple Alley sat in his office opening his morning mail; "Handsome Dennison," his fellow brokers called him. The whole alley, even to Mother Griffin, knew him as a man who had plenty of money, made plenty, and spent it proportionately.

There was one letter in Handsome Dennison's pile, however, that was not turned over to the chief clerk to be answered. It was a little tinted thing, not over-beautifully addressed, but still evidently precious to Dennison, as he smuggled it away into his pocket to read at leisure. An hour later, as he went off to the Stock Exchange, Dennison stepped into Mother Griffin's, got a glass of toddy to keep out the cold, and glanced over the note.

"Dear Jimmie," it said, "your confounded advice to a poor woman who needs every penny she can get has just lost me a thousand on Kaffirs. I'm coming down to the office this afternoon, and you must make it good. If you don't, somebody else will."

The note was signed "Merrie," nothing else; but Dennison looked up at the poster of Merrie Maywood, still hanging in the window, and muttered something about "blood-sucker."

Trade at Mother Griffin's was always better between three and four in the afternoon. On the steps of the Exchange, shortly after three o'clock, Dennison and a trio of broker friends stood for a moment, putting their umbrellas up before going down to Mother Griffin's. Dennison started across the street first, just as a hansom came slipping along the icy asphalt, and had to dodge between it and a dray which was on the other side of the hansom.

As he did so, a blonde head and a pair of broad, fur-wrapped shoulders thrust themselves out of the window of the carriage and looked towards him.

A moment later and a shrill cry stopped Dennison's friends, and they wheeled about. The hansom was empty, its driver climbing down from his seat in a hurried, excited way. The big dray on the other side was slipping along the icy street with wheels locked, and behind it, bending over a mass of fur and golden hair, was Dennison. Grimsby caught a glimpse of a stylish hat lying in the sleety mud of the street, and a glint of silk from the figure over which Dennison knelt.

"She's been hurt, Paulson," exclaimed Grimsby, darting back to the spot. Paulson followed, reaching them in time to help lift and carry the limp, nerveless form to the pavement.

"It's Merrie," gasped Paulson, who was evidently in a shaky state, and could only stare at the dirty, bedraggled garments of the woman.

"Yes, it's Merrie. Don't stand there that way. We are going to carry her to Mother Griffin's. Tell the ambulance to come there."

Paulson hustled off, breaking through the gathering crowd, while Grimsby and Dennison, with the driver, lifted the body, and began to carry it tenderly towards the little tavern. A street arab ran ahead and opened the door, only to be followed by the crowd.

Dennison, his face white and set, entered first, supporting in his arms the head and shoulders of his burden. Down on the floor they laid her, Shamus coming out from behind the bar, excited, nervous and useless.

Dennison still kept close to the injured woman; but now, when the head, with its wreath of golden hair, lay on the sanded floor, his nerve gave way. If he had ever quarrelled with her for her faithlessness to him he forgot it; if he had shuddered at her reckless nature, he also forgot that; if he had sometimes, even with his love, loathed the ignorant, untrained nature under the superficial exterior, he lost all knowledge of it. Only the closed eyes, and blue, pain-drawn lips, and the pallor of approaching death, appealed to him now.

"Merrie, Merrie," he whispered hoarsely, "it's Jim Don't you know me. Are you hurt very much?"

But there was no answer, and Dennison's face began to show signs of a fear which had not before suggested itself.

"Merrie," went on Dennison, "Merrie! Why doesn't that ambulance come? Are they going to let my Merrie die here like this?"

Suddenly the door of the back room, Mother Griffin's particular haunt, opened, and the old lady stood in the doorway. her eyes taking in the scene of half-a-dozen men kneeling by a prostrate woman, and her ears catching the words: "Are they going to let my Merrie die like this?"

Sometimes the truth strikes us mortals like a lightning-flash—there is an instant's illumination of the mind, and we have the whole story.

The next instant Dennison saw another face beside Merrie's, and another figure kneeling like himself, and, strangest of all, Mother Griffin's eyes peering at Merrie's closed ones, and Mother Griffin's voice softly calling "daughter" into Merrie's ear.

Suddenly there was a rattle of wheels outside, followed by the appearance of Paulson, and a tall, whiskered young man in blue. The young man pushed Dennison aside, and he, too, knelt by Merrie. Grimsby told him that she had been run over, "right across the body"—the young surgeon took no heed.

"You had better get the crowd out and notify the police. I can't do anything. She'll be dead in ten minutes," was all he said.

. . . . . .

Dennison's office is still down in Apple Alley, and Dennison still inhabits it, but with the air of a man who is trying to outdrink and outlive his memory. There is still a saloon at the old stand, but Mother Griffin doesn't run it, although icebergs and toddy are still the specialities. Shamus, whose patronymic—O'Brien—hangs over the door, has been to the "Hi-diddle-diddlety," time and time again, since he had the business given to him; but he has not forgotten a woman who once sang "Drinkety-drink, boys," to the tune of a thousand applauding beer-glasses. There has been no other like her.

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS' TREASURE

SUMMARY.

The mail train has been robbed between Cornwall and La Grange stations, and £20,000 worth of gold stolen by a gang of desperadoes, headed by two brothers named Mulligan. Two passengers on the train—Adolph Squirrek, alias Smith, a detective tracking the Mulligans, and Fred Weldon, a young lawyer—who have struck up an acquaintance on the way, alight at Somerville, where the former stopped at the "Drover," and the latter at his mother's house. During the night a message comes to say that Judge Woodland's horse has come back alone, and Weldon, together with Squirrek and two other men set out to find him, and discover one of Mulligan's confederates lying senseless on the road. The man, who had made an unsuccessful attempt on the life of the judge, is sentenced to forty years' imprisonment. At Judge Woodland's Weldon meets a Spaniard named Alvarido Almanaz, and the two men become rivals for the love of Florence, the judge's daughter.

CHAPTER IX.

THE SHADOW AND THE VISION.

(From the Journal of Frederick Weldon.)

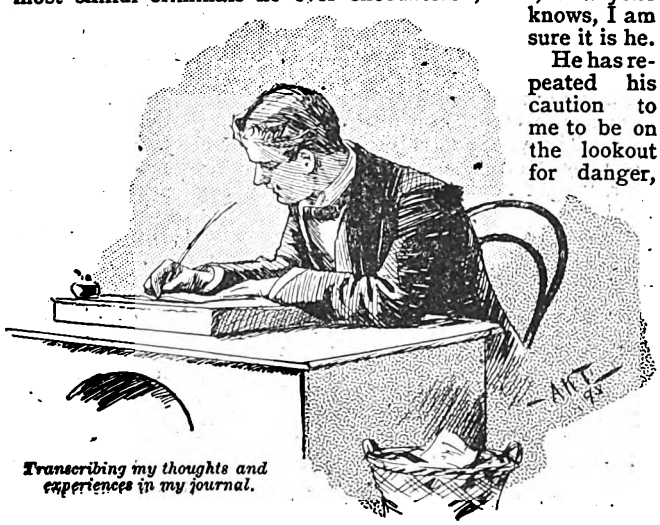
THURSDAY, October 19th.—Here I am again in my office, which I left a week ago on a visit to my home in Somerville. Into this one brief week there have been more events crowded than in any year of my life, and as I sit here, late in the evening, transcribing my thoughts and experiences in my journal, I find myself at a loss where to begin and what to say.

I am here by the commands of Adolph Squirrek, whom the longer I study the more I respect.

"Poor Tom Borie," as he was pathetically termed by his pal, is now safely lodged in the prison at Clayton, and has already served two days of the forty years' confinement which lie before him. I had the pleasure of acting as one of the guards, and we never caught a glimpse of the distinguished Mulligan brothers, although they could not but have known what was going on.

It cannot be that they have made up their minds to be law-abiding citizens, and to give up their nefarious practices. Squirrek tells me they have men among them who are the most skilful criminals he ever encountered, and, if anyone knows, I am sure it is he.

He has repeated his caution to me to be on the lookout for danger, and I am as wide awake as a man can well be, but I haven't been disturbed yet, although a suspicious circumstance occurred last night, when I got out of the train. When I was walking from the station to Mrs. Spriggins', my good landlady's, I became sensible of some man following me.



Transcribing my thoughts and experiences in my journal.

It makes a fellow feel anything but comfortable to become conscious, on a dark night, that there is someone treading softly behind him, very likely searching for some place in his back where he can drive his stiletto or bowie, and I did some rather "tall-walking"; but the stranger, who had on a pair of squeaking boots, maintained his distance, and the only escape left for me was to break into a run, and, as it was by no means certain that I could outrun him, I gave heed to my pride, and kept up a brisk walk, which would have looked very natural on such a cool evening.

I had come up the walk, and thrust my key in the door, when I heard the squeak of a pair of boots, and, turning my head, was just in time to catch a passing sight of a tall form, walking very rapidly, by the gate. I could not gain the slightest view of the face, nor even of the particular character of the dress. The night was quite dark, and the man, whoever he was, looked very much like the shadow of a man as it is seen to whisk along the side of a house when passing a street-lamp.

An interesting question presents itself at this point, as to the identity of the individual who has taken such an interest in my welfare. Squirrek would doubtless set him down as one of the gang, who is following me with a fell purpose, and if Squirrek said so he would be right.

I am certain only of one thing, and that is, the gentleman who just now is occupying my thoughts is certainly over six feet in height. Hold—I have another point—he wears squeaking boots.

Item. Henceforth tall men in squeaking boots are to be viewed with suspicion.

SATURDAY EVENING.—For the first time since taking up the honoured profession of law I have my hands full of business, although it cannot be said to be strictly of a legal character.

To-day I received a letter from Squirrek—a brief note, saying that the shadows which had been flitting so tantalisingly before him are beginning to take the shape of realities, and he has already secured several interesting threads in the tangled web that he is endeavouring to unravel.

Nothing very definite in that, truly; but on the whole it is encouraging. Squirrek is a man of business, and he seems to have got fairly to work. He has taken me into his confidence, which doesn't mean a great deal at present. I know nothing of his plans, nor which particular trail he is following just now. He isn't apt to be over confidential, and I have to wait until he chooses to explain what he is doing.

He instructs me to watch every visible straw, and to do my utmost in a cautious way to find out who are implicated in the wholesale criminalities of the Mulligan business. It is pretty evident that Squirrek is going into this thoroughly, and with the resolve to make a complete job of it. He is very cautious in his utterances, especially when he has a pen in hand; but I think I can detect in the studied brevity of his epistle the exultation of a man who has made an important discovery. He asks me for any item of news, and I don't see what I have to give him.

Digitized by Google

One or two things have occurred since I last had my journal in hand, which, perhaps, might interest Squirrek, although I can't see anything particularly remarkable in them.

Upon calling at the post-office this afternoon, I learnt that some gentleman had been there before me, and taken out a missive addressed to me, saying that he had been requested to call, and I was too much occupied with my law business! He must have been a malicious wag, and the pursy post-master a veritable Mrs. Partington.

I became sensible of some one following me.

But who was he? This is the question I have been continually asking myself, and am still unable to give a satisfactory response. The most that I can learn is that he was rather a tall man, which makes it possible that he may have my shadow; but whether he wears squeaking boots or not is a question which cannot be solved until he is seen again, or our post-master acquires more observing habits.

After all, it may have been a mere joke played upon me by some friend, and the only thing that troubles me is as to whom this letter was from. It cannot be from my mother, as she invariably answers my letters on Sunday, and if there were anything serious at home she would have telegraphed.

It must have been a second note from Squirrek, and if it has fallen into my shadow's hands, it may play the very mischief with the plans of that detective. That is the great thing to be feared. If it doesn't turn up by Monday I shall feel decidedly uneasy about it.

The second point that occurs to me is regarding the same shadow, which begins to make me feel like a haunted man. There is scarcely a walk that I take after dark but I do not see evidence that I am watched, and yet, when I undertake to turn the tables, and follow the ghostly personage, it flits out of sight like a veritable creation of the fancy.

I have more than once been tempted to send a few shots of my revolver after it, but the possibility of killing a man who has done me no personal harm deters me, and I can hardly bring myself to a point to take the risk. All that remains is for me to continue, or, rather, to increase my vigilance, and I stand a chance of tripping my shadow yet.

The third circumstance is the one that gave me the greatest surprise. In walking down the single street which Brampton can boast, I encountered Señor Almanaz, the Cuban, who made himself such a lion the other evening at Judge Woodland's—that is, in the opinion of the ladies.

The brilliant exquisite was dressed in his most elaborate style, and is truly a gorgeous personage. He looked keenly at me, as though he had forgotten my face, and then made a most polite bow, smiling so broadly that his white teeth gleamed like a wild animal's through his black moustache.

Perhaps it was rude in me to give him a short, businesslike nod, but I feared he was going to stop and speak to me, a catastrophe which I would have done anything to avoid. The young gentleman who is transcribing these lines in his journal has no special desire to cultivate the acquaintance of the distinguished Cuban.

In the meantime, nothing new is heard of the Mulligan gang. No new robberies, no new murders, no other trains thrown off the line.

There has been an additional reward of £1,000 offered for the extirpation of this gang, so that if Squirrek and myself really accomplish it there is quite a handsome sum awaiting us.

I don't see how I am to earn one half of it for thus far the work has been done entirely by him, while I have been simply an onlooker. My turn may come by-and-by.

CHAPTER X.

WELDON HAS AN APPOINTMENT.

SUNDAY.—As these pages are intended for no eye but mine, there is no longer any need of attempting to keep the secret from myself.

Surely there is enough to occupy my mind. Another note from Squirrek assures me that matters are progressing better than he had anticipated. I have learned that the intercepted note was simply a business letter of no importance. He is confident of a successful result. My shadow still haunts me, and I know that I am a marked man, that there are men seeking the opportunity to take my life, and that I can only escape by the kindness of heaven and my own vigilance.

The ghostly personage flits out of sight.

And yet there is another vision that haunts me, that is more continually before me than is anything else, and that the vision of Florence Woodland.

When on that terrible night she took my hand and asked me to bring back her father, and I turned and left her, I left my heart with her, and there it will ever remain.

WEDNESDAY. No use struggling against fate, and I have given up

Digitized by Google

I encountered Señor Almanaz, the Cuban.

struggling against it. Unless peremptory orders come from Squirrek within a week, I shall go back to Somerville, seek her out, and ask her whether I may be allowed to hope—whether in the firmament one single star, faint though it be, shall shine for me.

I know I shall make myself ridiculous, but the suspense is becoming too great to bear. If nothing occurs of a startling nature between this day week, I take the express to Somerville, and then——.

A WEEK LATER.—It has come at last. A letter from Squirrek, and it shows that he has sanded the decks, preparatory for action:

"DEAR WILSON,—You remember the High Bridge across the stream they call the Devil's Creek, a short distance beyond the point where our Mulligan friends saved the United States the trouble of transporting the mails any further? Well, you are to take the seven o'clock train to-morrow and get off at Cornwall, or the nearest station, and walk out to this bridge, where you will find me and a friend waiting for you. Come without fail; if anything should occur to prevent, telegraph me. SQUIRREK."

This was the letter which reached me this evening, by the last post.

Fortunately my legal business is not so pressing as to confine me to the house continually. I can afford to take a holiday of a day or two at least.

I find myself in quite a pleasurable excitement over the prospect of the stirring scenes before me and disposed to treat the matter of my shadow quite lightly.

He hasn't forgotten me entirely. This evening I heard the squeak of his boots, and feeling as though it was about time I got my hand into the detective business, I turned about and gave him chase. I got near enough to see his horizontal coat-tails, but he proved that his fleeting was greater than mine, and he speedily gave me the slip.

This shadow has come nearer running against a bullet than he, or, rather, I imagines. I have held my revolver in hand more than once, but something has restrained me.

I have come to the conclusion that the shadow is the visible form of one of my enemies, who is going to strike, but is not yet prepared to do so.

What brings my noble friend Señor Alvado Almanaz so often to this part of the world? This afternoon I encountered him again, gotten up in the same gorgeous and overwhelming manner. He didn't observe me, but I followed him with my eyes until he disappeared out of sight round the corner.

I have a suspicion of that man. I believe he and Squirrek are acquainted. I fancied they exchanged looks at Judge Woodland's the other evening, which meant something, although I did not see them address each other.

I am growing into the conviction that the señor is mixed up in this Mulligan business in some way or other, and, if in any way at all, it must be as a secret detective, who is watching me.

I am not pleased at the thought. Squirrek is a man that I respect, as I do any expert in his profession, and there is a certain feeling, not exactly awe, which comes over you when he turns those cold steel-grey eyes of his upon you, and makes you feel that you are standing in the presence of a man who can read your inmost secrets.

The confidence he has shown in me has inspired a reciprocal emotion, and I already begin to look upon him as my friend.

And this makes it disagreeable to associate the Cuban with him. I loathe the sight of that man, and I know the feeling would have been the same whether he had come between me and Florence Woodland or not.

I must manage to give the shadow the slip to-morrow, for I don't wish him to follow me to the High Bridge. If I discover Señor Almanaz in the train, I shall be well satisfied that he is following the same trail as Squirrek, and that the two will unite right speedily.

What means this business at night near the Devil's Creek? It is rather a lonely part of the country for a man to venture without company.

Why doesn't Squirrek make a flying visit to Brampton, and call at my office? Somebody would see him enter, and he would be set down as one of my clients, and we could arrange matters more comfortably in this room than near a high railway bridge at night.

Such a proceeding as his calling upon me might create suspicion. But he understands the art of disguising himself so thoroughly, that no one could suspect his identity unless it might be the——

Shadow! Has he a suspicion of that being who follows me so continually, and that might penetrate his own disguise?

I may set it down as a surety, that if Adolph Squirrek sends for me, it is to my interest to go. So I start to-morrow, and on my way to the depôt I will send him a telegram, that there may be no mistake.

Whatever the danger, there is the thought that I will be so many miles nearer to Somerville, and so many nearer her, whose name my pen shall not write.

(End of the Journal.)

Telegram from Frederick Weldon to Adolph Squirrek:—

"Am about to start to meet you as requested at the rendezvous this evening.—F. W."

The reply, which reached Brampton ten minutes too late:—

"Don't go; it is a trap for your destruction.—A. S."

CHAPTER XI.

THE REV. J. SKIGGS STARTS IN PURSUIT.

(From the Journal of Adolph Squirrek, Detective.)

I LAY it down as an infallible rule that the man who is liable to fall in love will never do for the noble profession of a detective. There are channels in the Orkney Islands where if the pilot turns a hand's-breadth to the right or left he goes to destruction.

The life of the detective is one of those Orkney channels, and if he halts a second to look at a pretty face or figure down he goes. The detective, above all things, must keep his head level.

My young friend Frederick Weldon never would make a detective. He is lacking in several essential qualities, too obvious to be mentioned in detail.

Digitized by Google

In looking over his journal I find he has quite a facility in the expression of his thoughts, and if it were not for his twaddle about the shadow, and the vision of Judge Woodland's daughter, it would make passable reading.

I was just beginning to get my work in hand when a telegram from Fred Weldon informed me that he was on the eve of starting for the place appointed for our meeting. The instant that dispatch was placed in my hands, I understood what it meant, and sent my reply, which I learnt reached here a few minutes too late to intercept him.

Being certain that there was mischief in the wind, I took the midnight train for Brampton, and owing to its being several hours behind time, I reached this antiquated town just as day was breaking.

At the hotel my name is recorded as Rev. J. Skiggs, from Chicago. My appearance is ministerial, and if the shadow is hovering round this office, I have no objection to his discovering all that he chooses regarding me and my errand in this quiet place.

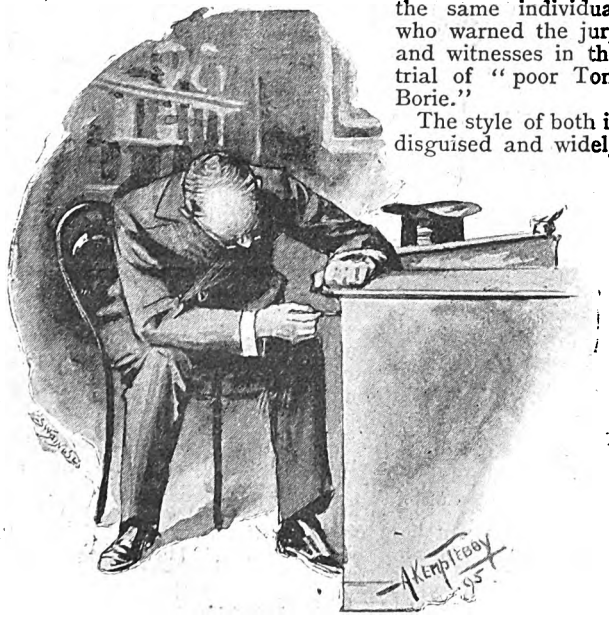
As a matter of course, I expected to find the lawyer's office locked, and so I came provided with the keys to let me in; and, getting in, it was very natural that the secretaire should be found in the same condition as the door. None of my keys would fit this lock, and so I was compelled to resort to the undignified proceeding of picking the lock for myself.

This was done, and upon opening the desk I found an inkstand, a gross of Gillot's pens, a few quires of paper, several sheets of which were covered over with the name of Florence Woodland, written in every sort of hand, but with the manifest purpose of doing it as well as possible, while in one place I observe the name of Frederick Weldon is in immediate juxtaposition to it, and both are surrounded by a net-work of flourishes, exceedingly suggestive of Cupid and that sort of thing.

Tucked off in one corner was Weldon's private journal, whereupon I locked the door, lit my cigar, and sat down in his chair, and have very leisurely read it through.

He shows an undue sensitiveness as to my detecting his secret, when I learnt it all on that evening we spent together at Judge Woodland's. With that, however, I have nothing to do at present, as there is a more important matter to occupy my attention, and that is the personal safety of Frederick Weldon himself.

Lying between the leaves of his journal was the note which has my name forged at the bottom of it. Something in the penmanship struck me as familiar, and a little closer examination revealed the interesting fact that this note was written by the same individual who warned the jury and witnesses in the trial of "poor Tom Borie."



The undignified proceeding of picking the lock.

The style of both is disguised and widely different, but there are earmarks which unmistakably show that one hand penned them all.

It is a bad looking place.

For the present the Mulligan Brothers must be left to themselves, as their case will bear a little postponement, while there is no time to be lost in looking after the welfare of my young friend.

It is plain that Weldon has implicitly followed the direction of the note, and gone to the High Bridge. Then one of three things has followed: he has been set upon and killed; he has been entrapped, and is now a prisoner; or he has gained a suspicion of his danger in time to make his escape.

Were he not in love, there would be some hope of the latter; but as it is, I shall hold no faith in it until the proof is before my eyes. If the first, or even the second contingency is the true one, it is pretty certain that some evidence has been left behind that will serve as an indication. Consequently my first duty is to go to Cornwall.

CHAPTER XII.

THE REV. GENTLEMAN LOSES HIS SERMONS.

CORNWALL, EVENING.—Carefully locking Weldon's journal in his desk I fastened the door of his office, and half an hour later stepped out of the train in this dingy little village. Upon inquiry I learnt that the High Bridge is four miles distant, and I started at once for it, walking with a heavy staff, and a very ministerial air, as though I were a shepherd in search of some wanderers from my flock.

I made no further inquiries, as it is important that no suspicions should be awakened at this point, and it isn't possible that I could have gained any information of benefit.

After a weary tramp, I entered the woods, and finally reached the railroad bridge over Devil's Creek. It is a bad-looking place, the rails being fully a hundred feet above the dark, narrow, sluggish stream flowing below, while there are silent, sombre woods on every hand. If the railway authorities should neglect this structure, what an opportunity for a great accident!

After reaching the bridge, my first proceeding was sharply to scrutinise every point that came within my range of observation, to make sure whether any one was watching me. I saw no signs of any one and began my work.

I first walked very carefully over the trestle work, and came within an ace of being run over, for just as I was on the centre I heard the rumble of the approaching train, and had barely time to get out of the way when it thundered out of the woods, and was gone almost on the instant.

Digitized by Google

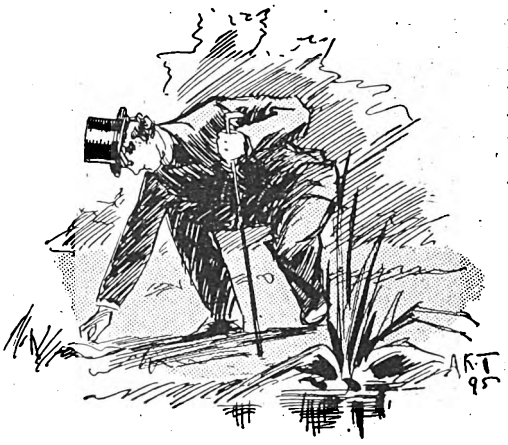
I returned, twice walked the entire length of the bridge, but without discovering the slightest trace of anything of a suspicious nature, in which I was not disappointed; for it is not to be supposed that a man would venture out upon a dangerous railway bridge to meet a friend, although it seems to me that there is hardly anything too ridiculous for a man in love to do.

It is still more unlikely that he would have crossed the bridge to the other side, and, as a natural consequence, whatever occurred of a tragic nature in my friend's history, must have taken place on the side of the stream which was first reached.

To this I therefore confined my observation, and for several hundred yards back and forth I walked, with my eyes fixed upon the rails and ties, but still without attaining any definite result. The hard gravel between the timber is not very susceptible to the impression of a foot, but no violent struggle could have taken place here without leaving some trace, which I am sure I would have detected.



It lay just on the edge of the water.

My next point was under the bridge, and as I turned my steps in that direction, a shudder came over me. When a man is approaching alone a dismal place where there is reason to believe a recent murder has been committed, and where there is an equally strong probability that the murderers have their eyes upon him, he is apt to feel somewhat squeamish, and to carefully look at every step he takes, ready at any moment to draw back to the cheerful sunlight he is leaving behind him.

An atom of success rewarded my search under the bridge. The stream at this point, I should remark, is less than ten feet in width, and a man could easily ford it without wetting his knees. The water is very clear, but with a black, clayey bottom, which at the first appearance gives you the impression that you are looking upon a stream of ink; but the clear glimmer of a white pebble here and there shows you your error, and proves that the water is remarkably pellucid.

It would be a physical impossibility for the body of a dog to be hid in this portion of the Devil's Creek; and as I stood on the bank, carefully scrutinising the inky bottom, the conviction became stronger and stronger each moment that Frederick Weldon had not been murdered here.

I was on the point of starting down stream, when I caught sight of a bit of paper on the bank, and at the same moment saw there was writing upon it. It lay just on the edge of the water, and was quickly in my hand.

I was somewhat disappointed when it proved to be part of a printed blank, such as lawyers use. There was visible on it the printed word, "presents," while below there could be seen in script the words, "of sale."

These proved that the bit of paper had been torn from a "bill of sale," the printed word being the last of the well-known phrase, "Know all men by these presents," while below the words "of sale" had been written with the pen.

The fact that this is written with violet ink, which just now is beginning to become popular—that, although dashed off hastily, it shows a beautiful round hand, makes me suspect (nothing more) that the paper, no longer ago than yesterday, was in the hands of Frederick Weldon, but whether dropped from the bridge above or not can only be conjectured.

Hoping that there might be something more than this, I turned to move further down the stream, when a footstep arrested me, and I found myself suddenly face to face with one of the Mulligan gang.

The man was dressed in the garb of a simple farmer, and was covered with dust and dirt, as though he had just come from the plough, while there was a simple, half-idiotic look in his face and an ordinary garden-hoe balanced over shoulder. I would have been an ass had I failed to detect his disguise on the instant.

"Hullo, stranger! ain't you lost?"

"Hullo, stranger! ain't you lost?" he asked with the peculiar accent of the illiterate Western farmer.

"I almost fear so," I replied with as bland a smile as I could put on. "I am sorry I had to make this tramp, for it is harder work than I have been accustomed to."

"What made you do it then?"

"I couldn't very well avoid it. You see, when I engaged to preach in Cornwall last Sabbath, I sent a package containing several of my sermons by train. The messenger is a young friend of mine, and he gladly took charge of them, without charging me anything for his services. But when he reached Cornwall he amazed me by informing me that they were lost. He said that when they reached the High Bridge—as I believe they call this place—the engine gave a whistle of danger, and he hastily stepped out upon the platform to see what it meant—holding my package in one hand.

"As he did so, the conductor followed him, striking his elbow, and the same instant my sermons went spinning down in the darkness. As soon as I discovered my loss, I started out here on foot after them, and I'll give any man a sovereign who will find them. Do you feel able to help me?"

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

THE BLACK CROSS.

I MADE his acquaintance during an altercation he was having with a Neapolitan cab-driver. The "Signor," it would seem, had "seven times tried to mangle him" during a sevenpenny ride across the city, and on the eighth attempt had apparently accomplished his design.

When a free and enlightened American citizen who has spent the best years of his life roughing it on the prairies and a child of sunny Italy, of the Neapolitan cabdriving persuasion, come to loggerheads, the atmosphere round the parish in which they are disputing is apt to become a trifle sultry. Certainly it did on this occasion.

I was some use, I think, in smoothing Mr. Plummer's plumage, and from that moment we were fast friends. Indeed we went up Vesuvius together the next day. It was whilst in the train going to Pompeii that he told me the following incident, but for the sake of brevity, I have omitted the conversation that led up to it:

"A black cross had been set against Judge Hawkins's name. Why, it is not for me to say. We were not accustomed to explain our motives or to give reasons for our deeds. The deeds were enough, and this black cross meant death; and when it had been shown us, all that we needed to know further was at what hour we should meet for the contemplated raid.

"A word from the captain settled that, and when the next Friday came a dozen men met at the place of rendezvous ready for the ride which should bring them to the Judge's solitary mansion across the mountains. I was among them, and in as satisfactory a mood as I had ever been in my life, for the night was favourable and the men hearty and in first-rate condition.

"The house towards which we were riding was built on a hillside, and the first thing we saw on emerging from the forest was a light burning in one of its distant windows. This was a surprise, for the hour was late, and in that part of the country people were accustomed to retire early, even such busy men as the Judge. He must have a visitor, and a visitor meant a possible complication of affairs; so a halt was called, and I was singled out to reconnoitre the premises.

"The house, which had now become plainly visible, was a solid one of stone, built, as I have said, on the hillside. It faced the road, as was shown by the large portico dimly to be discerned in that direction, but its rooms were mainly on the side, and it was from one of these that the light shone.

"As I came yet nearer I perceived that these rooms were guarded by a piazza, which, communicating with a portico in front, afforded an open road to that window and a clear sight of what lay behind it. I was instantly off my horse and upon the piazza, and before I had time to realise that my fears had returned to me with double force, I crept stealthily towards that uncurtained window and looked in.

"What did I see? At first nothing but a calm, studious figure bending above a batch of closely-written papers, upon which the light shone too brightly for me to perceive much of what lay behind them. But gradually an influence, of whose workings I was scarcely conscious, drew my eyes away, and I began to discover on every side strange and beautiful objects which greatly interested me, until suddenly my eyes fell upon a vision of loveliness so enchanting that I forgot to look elsewhere and became for the moment nothing but sight and feeling.

"It was a picture, or so I thought in the first instant of awe and delight. But presently I saw that it was a woman, living, and full of the thoughts that had never been mine; and at the discovery a sudden trembling seized me, for I had never seen anything like her beauty, while she saw nothing but the man who was bending over his papers.

"But it was her face that held me, and made of me from moment to moment a new man. For in it I discerned what I had never believed in till now—devotion that had no limit, and love which asked nothing in return. She seemed to be faltering on the threshold of that room as one who would like to enter but does not dare, and in another moment, with a smile that pierced me through, she turned as if to go.

"Instantly I forgot everything but my despair, and leant forward with an impetuosity that betrayed my presence. She glanced quickly towards the window, and, seeing me, turned pale, even while she rose in height till I felt myself shrink and grow small before her.

"Thrusting out her hand, she caught from the table before her what looked like a small dagger, and holding it up advanced upon me with blazing eyes and parted lips, not seeing that the Judge had risen to his feet, not seeing anything but my face glued against the pane, and staring with an expression that must have struck to the heart as surely as her look pierced mine. When she was almost upon me I turned and fled.

"How soon I met my mates I cannot say. In a few minutes, doubtless, for they had stolen after me and had detected me running away from the window. I was forced to tell my tale, and I told it unhesitatingly, for I knew I could not save him—if I wanted to—and I asked that she be spared not only from sharing his fate, but from the sight of his death, for she loved him.

"This from me! No wonder the captain stared, then laughed. But I did not laugh in return, and, being the strongest man in the band, and the surest with my rifle, he did not trifle long, but listened to my plans, and, in part, consented to them, so that I retreated to my post at the gateway with something like confidence, while he, approaching the door, lifted the knocker, and let it fall with a resounding clang that must have rung like a knell of death to the hearts within.

"For the judge knew our errand. I saw it in his face when he rose to his feet; and he had no hope, for we had never failed in our attempts, and the house though strongly built, was easily assailable.

"While the captain knocked, three men had scaled the portico and were ready to enter the open windows if the judge refused to parley, or offered any resistance to what was known as the captain's will.

"'Death to the judge!' was the cry, and it was echoed not only at the door but round the house, where the rest of the men had drawn a cordon ready to waylay any one who sought to escape. Death to the judge! And the judge was loved by that woman and would be warned by her still. But a voice is speaking, a voice from out that great house, and it asks what is wanted and what the meaning is of these threats of death.

"And the captain answers short and sharp:

"'The regulator commands, but he never explains. What he commands now is for Judge Hawkins to come forth. If he shrinks or delays, his house will be entered and burnt, but if he will come out and meet like a man what awaits him, his house shall go free and his family remain unmolested.'

"'And what is it that awaits him?' pursued the voice.

"'Four bullets,' returned the captain.

"'It is well; he will come forth,' cried the voice, and then in a huskier tone; 'Let me kiss the woman I love. I will not keep you long.'

"And the captain answered nothing, only counted out clearly and steadily 'One—two—three,' up to a hundred; then he paused, turned and lifted his hand; when instantly our four rifles rose, and at the same moment the door, with a faint grating sound I shall never forget, slowly opened, and the firm, unshrinking figure of the Judge appeared.

"We did not delay. One simultaneous burst of fire, one quick crack, and his figure fell before our eyes. A sound, a cry from within, then all was still, and the captain, mounting his horse, gave one quick whistle, and galloped away. We followed him, but I was the last to mount, and did not follow long, for at the flash of those guns I had seen a smile cross our victim's lip, and my heart was on fire. I could not rest till I had found my way back to that open doorway and the figure lying within it.

"There it was, and behind it a house empty as my heart has been since that day. A man's dress covering a woman's form—and over the motionless, perfect features that same smile which I had seen in the room beyond, and again in the quick glare of the rifles."

Digitized by Google

A SHEEP IN WOLF'S CLOTHES

MR. AMORY CABOT GORDON had been everywhere, knew everybody, and had done everything. He was an "American citizen," and therefore beyond the contagion of foreign influences.

It was in the full consciousness of this fact that Gordon promenaded the broad deck of the Cunarder Lucania, bound New Yorkward, looking about the motley crowd to discover whom there was on board worth speaking to, or, even, worth speaking of. For the most part Gordon's journeys across the Atlantic had been made in the solemn silence of social exclusiveness. He always read over the passenger list while sipping his coffee on the first morning out, and occasionally he came across a name he knew.

But upon this particular voyage the ship carried no one of whom he had ever heard before. At dinner, for two days, he talked to the captain, at whose side he sat, but outside of such infrequent discourse his communications were limited to the matutinal colloquialisms and unwarranted greetings of absolute strangers. Gordon never could understand why he should be expected to talk to somebody he had never before seen, simply because they both were, unfortunately, fifteen hundred miles from land.

It rained the third day out. There had been awnings to leeward during the afternoon, which had made the deck endurable, but later these had been reefed, and everything was in a spongy condition. The smoking-room was full of Jews, squabbling over cards, and was certainly a place to be avoided; but, as there was no other refuge in which to indulge in a post-prandial cigar, Gordon entered reluctantly.

As he went in he cast his most scrutinising glance through the murky atmosphere; physiognomies of all countries and conditions met his gaze, and in a distant corner he discovered a vacant seat next an Englishman. The man was smoking a briar pipe, and wore rough grey tweeds and huge boots that could only be dignified as "clod-hoppers."

Five minutes passed with the monotonous puff-puff of pipe and cigar, and then the Englishman, with that sort of bold shyness which is a national characteristic, turned more directly towards Gordon and inquired whether he was an American.

"I am a Bostonian," said Gordon.

"Oh!" said the Englishman, "I—er—thought you were—different."

"Different from what?" asked Gordon.

"Different to the—er—others," he replied with a gesture that included the occupants of the smoking-room.

Gordon shuddered. "Foreigners will never realise our class distinctions," he began, rather stiffly. "As a matter of fact, our lines are as rigid as—as yours. Of course, we have no royalty and no nobility, but our old families occupy much the same position."

"How interesting," said the Britisher, resuming his pipe. "Were you much in England?"

"I go to London every season—just run over for a little shopping, go to a ball or two, and do a few theatres," said Gordon.

"What a bore that must be," declared the other slowly. "I hate good old London. I live in the North."

Gordon saw visions of Liverpool manufacturers and Yorkshire tradesmen.

It transpired that the Englishman's name was Loame. He pointed it out to Gordon on the passenger list—T. Loame, Esq. It was not the sort of name that evoked vistas of ancestral grandeur; nevertheless, there was something in the man's manner that inspired the Bostonian with the feeling that he had not made a mistake, and on the following morning, when the two men met, he greeted him with a not uncordial nod.

Loame was of the type which is called "big." He was over six feet high and turned fourteen stone; but his solidity was all bone and muscle, and there was not a superfluous ounce of flesh on his stalwart frame. Gordon could not help admiring the fine animal type which was in such contrast to his own blue-blooded refinement.

Gradually the two men drifted into conversation again, and Gordon discovered that his chance acquaintance had travelled widely and was well read.

By the end of the voyage the acquaintance of the two men had assumed a mild semblance of friendship. And it was not without some sensations of regret that, as the Liberty of Bartholdi loomed in sight one bright November day, they realised that they must part.

"Well," said Gordon as he held out his hand, "I hope we may meet again some day."

"Oh, thanks!" replied Loame.

"And if you—come—to Boston," added the Bostonian, hesitatingly, "I shall—be glad—to—see—you."

"Oh, thanks!" replied the Englishman again.

"I should like to show you some civility, in a quiet way, you know," Gordon went on, slowly. "Of course, I couldn't do much, you understand. My people's set is very—well, er—exclusive, I might say. We don't care much for strangers—without proper introductions."

"I see!" said Loame.

"Have you brought any letters?" probed Gordon, who liked the man, and would have allowed himself some enthusiasm in his behalf if he had been sure of his perfect eligibility. He racked his brainr for any connection possible between "Loame" and the peerage. The name conveyed nothing to him but misty visions of sooty cities in midland counties.

"Letters?" repeated the Englishman. "Yes; I have a few, but I shall not deliver them. I never do. I don't believe in credentials. There's many a good horse without pedigree. I carried letters about once—when I was too young to know better. I was a sort of amateur postman in those days, and after I delivered them I was bored to death. There are two sorts of kindness in the world—that which asks you to dinner, and that which doesn't. I prefer the latter."

"Of course, we feel differently on those subjects," said Gordon. "Anyway," he added, "let me know when you reach Boston. Every Englishman likes a club, and I'll put you up at the tavern. It isn't the 'Somerset,' you know: but you can get a grilled bone there, and have a comfortable smoke."

Then, with another handshake, they parted. Loame went in search of his portmanteau and gun cases, while Gordon left his man-servant in charge of his numerous articles—hat-boxes, shirt-cases, and trunks.

II.

Boston was very gay that year—gay, at least, for Boston. Several débutantes had been sacrificed upon the High Altar of Fashion at "Teas" given in their honour. Mrs. Pushing was a very great lady, even among such people as the Baylees, and the Brayers, and the Trimmers, who never condescended to know anybody whose grandfathers and grandmothers their own grandfathers and grandmothers had not known.

Poor Mrs. Pushing! She was, no doubt, easily queen, but she realised that her throne was in danger. She already had invitations out for a big crush on the following Wednesday night, but there was no lion to roar. Of course she had captured a dozen tame celebrities, but everybody had heard their little plaintive social whines.

Digitized by Google

She met Amory Gordon one day, and buttonholed him at once. "What shall I do?" she exclaimed with her most fetching accent. And then she explained the situation.

Later, Gordon was walking towards his club trying to solve Mrs. Pushing's riddle. He had not gone very far when his mind was diverted by finding himself face to face with a familiar countenance and the realisation that a hand was held out to him.

"Oh—how d'y'do," said Loame, in his perfectly modulated British monotone, as if they had parted yesterday and were sure of meeting to-morrow.

"How are you?" ejaculated Gordon. "Well, you are the last man I expected to see. Now that you have come," he went on, as he took in his friend's attire, and recognised, with some chagrin, those same old grey tweeds and clod-hoppers, "now that you have come, you must let me do something for you. Shall I give you a card for the Tavern Club?"

"I've just been to the Athletic and had a Turkish bath," said Loame. "Some one who came over on the Pullman with me introduced me there. His name is Snopper."

Gordon winced. The Athletic Club was as plebeian as a policeman. Snopper, he knew, made boots—the best boots, to be sure—but, a tradesman! "Where are you stopping?" he demanded, and was told the name of one of the commercial hotels. "You ought to have on an overcoat," he said again, as he was preparing to break away from his steamer acquaintance, with the inward conviction that he had been a great ass to pick up promiscuous friends.

"Why? To cover up these old togs?" asked Loame ingenuously, with a glance of affection at the grey tweeds. "My dear Gordon, I wouldn't part with 'em for anything; there are fourteen pockets in 'em. Besides, I never wear an overcoat except at night."

Gordon held out his hand, not very cordially.

"I must go," he said. "I have no end of engagements. We are rushing things in our set just now—busy times, you know. Half a hundred things on hand—dinners, balls, and all sorts. Mrs. Pushing has a big affair on for Wednesday, and I'm kind of envoy. I wish you had come with a few letters—just as credentials."

Loame laughed good-naturedly.

"I shall not present any letters," he said. "Perhaps I may meet you again, or we may possibly run across each other in England. Au revoir!"

He walked away briskly with his long, clod-hopping stride, and was soon out of sight.

It could not have been said of Loame that he was in any way vain. The tweeds proved that, although they were unquestionably becoming to his big, blonde manliness; nevertheless, as he walked along he could not help thinking to himself "that he would like to take it out of that little Gordon, somehow." He did not resent the Bostonian's inferences of his inferiority; some natures are above such smallness. He realised perfectly well that, so far as Boston was concerned, Gordon was pretty sure of his ground—such insecure ground as it was—but he did wish, with a not unkindly smile, "that he could have that little popinjay just half an hour in England." . . . And then, suddenly, a brilliant idea struck him.

He went back to the Commercial Hotel and packed his Gladstones, strapped his gun cases, paid his bill, tipped the servants and called a cab. In less than half an hour he was at the Hotel Brunswick, where he registered as Lord Rayne, and took the most expensive apartments in the house.

On the following day all the morning papers announced his arrival, and in the afternoon several cards were brought to him. Among them was that of Mr. Richard T. Pushing, and Mr. Pushing was received.

Lord Rayne appeared faultlessly attired in a black coat, which made him look very tall and dignified. He welcomed Pushing cordially, and the two men discussed current topics, and mundane affairs, with the cognisance of men of the world. They soon discovered that they had many mutual friends, and, in fact, one of Pushing's sisters had married a cousin of Rayne's, and lived not far from the family seat at Haylestone.

"Now, you must let me do what I can for you while you are here," he said. "I shall send you a card for the 'Somerset' at once, and on whatever night you are free you must dine with me and some of my cronies there. In the meanwhile my wife will send you an invitation to some big 'jamboree' she's got on to-morrow, and if there is anything I can do in any way I shall expect you to let me know at once."

Thus, on the night of the "jamboree," Mrs. Pushing was in high feather. She had secured a foreign lion to roar in her menagerie. The great double house—two houses, indeed, thrown into one—was resplendent, and Mrs. Pushing was the most resplendent thing of all.

She was smiling radiantly when Amory Gordon arrived, and he understood at once that she had secured some innovation with which to titillate the jaded palate of her social epicures. "Such a piece of luck," she said to him the first thing. "Lord Rayne has just come to Boston, and I made Dick hunt him down immediately, and he is sure to be here to-night."

It was very late indeed when Lord Rayne was announced. There was a momentary cessation in the buzz and hum of conversation as the Englishman appeared.

Mrs. Pushing went forward and met her guest of honour graciously, who bowed over her hand. Gordon, standing near his hostess, looked as if he saw an apparition.

"Let me introduce you to Lord Rayne," said Mrs. Pushing smiling.

The two men bowed.

"I think we have met—before," said the Englishman.

"Possibly. I am not clever at remembering names," replied Gordon stiffly.

"Nor faces, perhaps?" asked the other. "Recollecting people whom one has met before is more often a matter of good manners than of good eyesight." And then he turned away to follow his hostess, and to go through a series of presentations.

That evening added to Mrs. Pushing's reputation. She was hostess par excellence, and Lord Rayne made himself very popular indeed.

When it was all over, and everybody was making preparations for departure, Gordon went up to his quondam friend.

"See here, Loame," he said slowly, "this may amuse you immensely, but I don't see the joke."

"I think it's awfully funny," said the Englishman. "I've been laughing in my sleeve the whole time," and he broke into his big, hearty, boyish guffaw.

"It must stop," asserted Gordon, sternly. "These people are my friends, and I won't have them imposed upon."

"I told you we might meet somewhere," replied the Englishman, with great quietness: "and I thought it far more likely that I should see you in your set than that you would ever see me in mine. So I simply registered at an hotel as Lord Rayne. I am not imposing upon anybody in the least, my friend—unless it be upon you, because, you see, I really am Lord Rayne—and here are some of the letters which I didn't think it worth while to present." He handed one letter to Gordon.

It was addressed to Mrs. Richard Pushing, introducing Lord Rayne, the only son of the Marquess of Haylestone and Snowdowne, and was from the Duchess of Harchester.

A MERE MASQUERADER.

No. 10 of PEARSON'S LIBRARY.

This splendid complete novel is by Mrs. GEORGE CORBETT, and contains many full-page illustrations.

The whole, extending to over 220 pages, can be purchased for

SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google

A TALE OF INDIAN SORCERY.

SOME fifteen years ago, while quartered with the ——th Native Infantry at Seceune, Madras Presidency, I was an interested eye-witness of a strange case of Indian necromancy.

My wife Laura, three children and myself, occupied one of the smaller bungalows in the regimental lines. In India the houses are built low, of only one story, with a thatched roof, and, mostly, with a covered-in verandah going straight round the house.

The servants do not live or sleep in the house, but occupy each a separate godown, or hut, in the compound, which is inclosed in a high brick wall or natural hedge. The garden gate opening from the carriage drive is kept shut, as a rule. I was very particular in this, as my wife had a horror of the countless beggars and lepers who are always hanging round in the hope of obtaining stray coin.

It was the eve of the Residency ball, the largest and most important dance in the season's festivities, and one at which every lady donned her smartest finery. My wife had, as usual on such occasions, spread her ball dress upon the bed early in the day; her fan, gloves, bangles, together with my studs and sleeve links, she put on the toilet table. A quaint, massive gold collarette, with a heart-shaped locket attached, she placed round the neck of a little marble figure which always stood in the centre of her dressing table, and served for a stand for her watch and chain.

The dressing table stood by the open window, and was easily seen by anyone in the verandah or garden outside.

Our bungalow was then undergoing the usual whitewashing deemed necessary in India every six or eight months.

The two men employed on the work—a father and son—were well known to me as thoroughly honest workmen. We had, therefore, no scruples in giving them free access over the house. Our servants and ayahs had been with us some years and were most trustworthy.

At eight o'clock, Laura retired to her room to dress, while I smoked a last cheroot in the verandah. I was startled from my pleasant reverie, about half an hour later, by Laura rushing out of the bedroom with her hair only half done and in evident distress.

"Oh, John, what shall I do? I can't find my gold necklace anywhere, and I am sure I put it on the toilette table this morning."

Of course a search was immediately made, and the room turned upside down; but the locket and chain had completely disappeared.

Several days went by and the necklet was not found. We had reluctantly been obliged to call in the aid of the police. Even they were at fault. The missing jewels had been spirited away, leaving no trace behind.

One morning, after turning out the bedroom, looking under the mats, shaking the curtains and moving the furniture for the ninety-ninth time, our Durzee, or tailor, asked permission to speak to me.

"Please, sare," he said, with a low salaam, "master, missus, servant—all no find chain; pleeceman, too, no find. Master please let me call one black Fakir man. He know everything; he soon find thief."

Of course I laughed and pooh-poohed the idea; but Nadiussen got round my wife, and she at length persuaded me to consent to his calling in a Fakir or fetish man to charm back the stolen article.

On Monday morning, about ten days after the theft, all our servants, the two white-washers, Laura, the children, and myself assembled in the front garden.

The Fakir, a weird, gaunt old man, rolled in a cumley (or blanket), and whose face and body were smeared with greasy white and yellow paint, directed us to sit on the short, dry, grass in an unbroken circle.

Standing in the centre of us, he soon lighted a small fire of dried twigs and grasses. As the flames leapt up and licked his face and hands, he chanted a peculiar low sing-song, and from time to time threw sweet-smelling aromatic herbs into the fire.

After this had gone on for about twenty minutes, he asked a few questions as to when and how the necklace had been lost; also, if all those in and about the house at that time were now present.

Being answered in the affirmative, he took a flat tin platter in his hand, which contained a small quantity of unboiled rice. Carefully making the round of the circle, he bade us each take a few grains of the rice in our left hands. When all had been supplied, he went back to the fire and told us to chew the rice carefully, watching us closely the while.

Uncooked rice is not pleasant to eat at the best of times, but under the present circumstances I, for one, had some difficulty in masticating it. The children rather enjoyed the fun; and just as I thought we had all safely accomplished our task, Punnyiah, the baby's nurse, and Kurroo, the white-washer's son, spluttered and coughed, and nearly choked themselves in endeavouring to swallow the raw grain. Their efforts were useless, and they were both obliged to spit out the half-chewed rice.

Immediately the Fakir started forward, and, clutching the woman and boy by their arms, dragged them within the circle. Still holding them, one with each hand, his body became perfectly rigid, his cumley dropped from his shoulders, his eyes nearly started from his head, and from their vacant look and the appearance of his body he had evidently gone off in a sort of trance.

Punnyiah turned a sickly yellow, and trembled in every limb. Kurroo's teeth chattered.

Slowly letting each word drop from his mouth, the Fakir began to speak in his native tongue.

Clearly and minutely he described the interior of the ayah's godown, and made us understand that the lost necklace (which he described as clearly as if he held it before him), was lying across one of the stones which form a native fireplace.

It seemed that Punnyiah was quite innocent of the theft, and her godown had only been used as a hiding place by the whitewasher's son.

This young man, though brought up conscientiously by his parents, was led astray by some wild young companions. Having lately taken to gambling, and being in much need of money, the lad was tempted by the sight of the jewels on my wife's dressing table, and had taken the chain and locket with the intention of pawning them, hoping to replace them when his luck had turned. Caution prevented his pawning the necklace at once.

On this particular morning, hearing that a Fakir had been sent for, and having all the superstitious beliefs of his class, he threw the necklet (which he always carried on his person) on the fire as he passed the ayah's godown, in the hope that it would be destroyed.

When the Fakir ceased speaking his fingers relaxed their hold, his eyelids quivered, and his body regained its normal state.

Folding his dark-brown blanket closely round his shrunken form, he made several low salaams, and informed me that his work was done.

Motioning all to keep their places, I and my head Peen went to Punnyiah's godown, and, sure enough, lying across the stones of the ayah's fire was the locket and chain, blackened and charred by the half-smouldering fire.

On the police being informed that the necklace was found, Punnyiah was taken to prison. My wife was beside herself with grief at the loss of baby's nurse.

The white-washer, in grief and sorrow at his son's disgrace, brought the boy up and forced him to make a confession. I did not press the charge, and Kurroo was let off with a light sentence.

Punnyiah returned to our household, to be petted and made much of by Laura and the servants.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

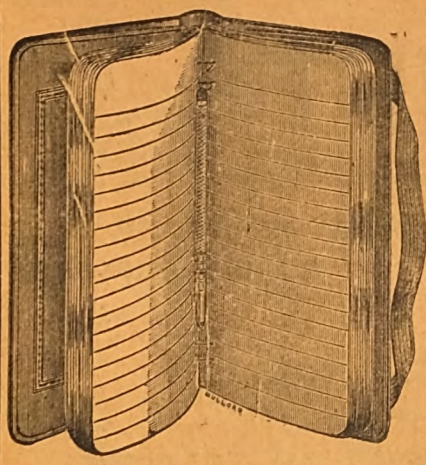
Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

COLLINS'

"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK,

WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST AND THE BEST.
THE SIMPLEST AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register" the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,

Bridewell Place, London, E.C.; 139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S
MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

FOR THE SMALL SUM OF 6s. 6d. WE WILL SEND AS FOLLOWS:—

NOT A TOY.

We give you A WATCH.

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.

FOR 6s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsome

KEYLESS WATCHES,

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

"Lowick-by-Beale, Northumberland, August 17.

"GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.

"Very truly yours,
"WILLIAM McISAAC."

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

"11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

"GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.

"I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,
"LEWIS C. RHODES."

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation. Money returned if not as represented.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call, or send to-day for the

6s. 6d. MONSTER PRESENTATION PARCEL INCLUDING THE HANDSOME KEYLESS WATCH.

S. S. GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

STORIES OF ALL SORTS FOR ALL PEOPLE.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 342. FOR WEEK ENDING JULY 20, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

A WONDERFUL MEDICINE.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS

Are universally admitted to be WORTH A GUINEA A BOX for Bilious and Nervous Disorders, such as Wind and Pain in the Stomach, Sick Headache, Giddiness, Fulness and Swelling after Meals, Dizziness and Drowsiness, Cold Chills, Flushings of Heat, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, Costiveness, Scurvy, Blotches on the Skin, Disturbed Sleep, Frightful Dreams, and all Nervous and Trembling Sensations, &c. The first dose will give relief in twenty minutes. This is no fiction, for they have done it in countless cases. Every sufferer is earnestly invited to try one box of these Pills, and they will be acknowledged to be

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

For females of all ages these Pills are invaluable, as a few doses of them carry off all humours, open all obstructions, and bring about all that is required. No female should be without them. There is no medicine to be found to equal BEECHAM'S PILLS for removing any obstruction or irregularity of the system. If taken according to the directions given with each box, they will soon restore females of all ages to sound and robust health. This has been proved by thousands who have tried them, and found the benefits which are ensured by their use.

For a weak stomach, impaired digestion, and all disorders of the liver, they act like "Magic," and a few doses will be found to work wonders upon the most important organs of the human machine. They strengthen the whole muscular system, restore the long-lost complexion, bring back the keen edge of appetite, and arouse, into action, with the Rosebud of Health the whole physical energy of the human frame. These are FACTS testified continually by members of all classes of society; and one of the best guarantees to the Nervous and Debilitated is

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Which Have the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World.

Being SIX MILLION BOXES per ANNUM.

Prepared only by THOMAS BEECHAM, ST. HELEN'S, LANCASHIRE,

And sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere, in Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with Full Directions.

THE 1s. 1½d. BOX CONTAINS FIFTY-SIX PILLS.

BEECHAM'S TOOTH PASTE RECOMMENDS ITSELF; it is efficacious, economical, cleanses the teeth, perfumes the breath, removes tartar, and prevents decay. It is composed of the best known ingredients for neutralising the acids of the mouth, preventing all deleterious deposits upon the teeth, and is a pleasant and reliable dentifrice. BEECHAM'S TOOTH PASTE is put up in collapsible tubes, perfectly air-tight, and so adjustable that no waste need occur; the packages are pretty for the toilet table, and most convenient for the travelling bag. Of all Druggists, or from the Proprietor, ONE SHILLING, postage paid.

Digitized by Google

"All Sorts and Conditions of Men"

USE

ST. JACOBS OIL

FOR RHEUMATISM, Gout, Sciatica, Neuralgia, Cramp, Pleurisy, Lumbago, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Soreness, Stiffness, Bruises, Tooth-ache, Headache, Backache, Feetache, Pains in the Back, Pains in the Shoulders, Pains in the Limbs, and all bodily aches and pains,

IT ACTS LIKE MAGIC.

SAFE, SURE, and NEVER FAILING. Price 1/1½ & 2/6.

CONQUERS PAIN

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,

GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

OVER 2,000 New and Secondhand. EASY TERMS

—From 10s. per month. Lists (200 page) and Testimonials post free. BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO., Liverpool; 45, Everton Road, and 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W. (close to Euston Road).

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

HAIR DESTROYED

Root and Branch absolutely exterminated without injury to the skin, entirely new treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, (Rooms O), Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

NOSE

A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE. Medically approved for Red Noses, 3/9 post free, under cover. Pamphlet "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1/-. Machines for Ugly Noses. Particulars for stamp LEES RAY, Specialist, Wavertree, Liverpool.

TOOTH-ACHE CURED INSTANTLY BY BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE

All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES

Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science: they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,

52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.

(Established 1851.)

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms.

Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticisms, and valuable Pamphlet containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

TO INVENTORS.

An Invention Protected for £1. Handbook, "How to Patent an Invention," giving full particulars, forms, &c., free from HUGHES & YOUNG, "Patent Editors" to the principal newspapers, 23, Coleman Street, London, E.C. Established 1829. INVENTORS ASSISTED IN WORKING OR SELLING INVENTIONS. Read "Patents."

TOO STOUT.

Prof. Holt's "H.D." Pills for Fat People

A rapid, permanent, and absolutely safe reduction, averaging 5 lbs. weekly, with improved Health and Figure, and without dietary restriction, guaranteed to all (either sex). Will reduce weight and cure corpulency in the most stubborn cases where other treatments have failed. They are small, entirely vegetable, agreeable, harmless, and highly recommended. Price, post free, plain wrapper, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box.—Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free. Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,

8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

New Harrison. W 1ST GOLD MEDAL.

KNITTER

KNITS STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 23 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" & "SUN" Machines.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 342.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 20, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

A RUSSIAN TRAGEDY

I WAS eighteen years old, and had been two years an ensign in the regiment of Paulovsky. The regiment was quartered in the great building that still exists on the other side of the Champ de Mars, fronting the summer garden. The Emperor Paul I. was then reigning, and had been for three years. He resided in the Red Palace, which had just at that time been completed.

One night, after I don't remember what escapade, the leave of absence which I had asked for, in order to join a few comrades, was refused, and I remained in the barracks almost alone. I was aroused from my sleep by a voice that whispered in my ear: "Dimitri-Alexandrovitch, wake up and follow me!" I opened my eyes. A man was before me, who repeated to me the invitation which he gave me while I was half-asleep.

"Follow you!" said I; "where?"

"I cannot tell you. But take notice that the order comes from the Emperor!"

I trembled. From the Emperor! What in the world could he want with me, a poor ensign—of a good family, no doubt, but far too distant from the throne to allow the name to reach the Imperial ear? I recalled the sombre Russian proverb that came into existence in the days of Ivan the Terrible: "Close to the Tsar, close to death!"

But there was no help for it. I jumped out of bed and dressed myself. Then I looked with some attention at the man who had come to arouse me. All wrapped up as he was in his overcoat, I thought I recognised in him an old Turkish slave, at first the barber, and finally the favourite, of the Emperor. This examination, moreover, was brief. It might, perhaps, have been dangerous to prolong it.

"Follow you!" said I; "where?"

"I am ready," said I, at the end of five minutes; and I buckled on my sword carelessly. My nervousness increased when I found that my guide, instead of taking the usual door of the barracks, descended through a little winding staircase into the lower portion of the immense building. He lighted the way with a sort of dark lantern. After several turns and detours, I found myself fronting a little door, the existence of which I had not known before. During all the route we met nobody. One could imagine that the building was deserted. Certainly I fancied that I saw one or two shadows pass, but they disappeared, or rather vanished in the obscurity.

The door in front of which we stood was closed. My guide knocked in a certain fashion, and it opened, evidently put in motion by a man who was waiting on the other side. As a matter of fact, when we passed through I saw distinctly, notwithstanding the darkness, a man, who closed the door again and followed us.

The passage which we entered was subterranean, about eight feet wide, and the moisture oozed through the brick walls.

At the end of about five hundred paces this passage was closed by an iron gate. My guide took a key from his pocket, opened the gate, and closed it behind us. We continued our route. Just then I commenced to recall the tradition according to which a subterranean gallery existed between the Red Palace and the barracks of the Grenadiers of Paulovsky. I knew that we were in this gallery, and that inasmuch as we had left the barracks, we were on our way to the palace.

We arrived in front of another door, similar to the one through which we had passed in the first instance. My guide knocked at this door in the same manner that he had knocked at the other one, and it opened like the other, set in motion by a man on the inside. Here we found ourselves at the foot of a staircase, which we mounted. It led to the lower apartment of a building; but, from the atmosphere, it was easy to discover that we were entering a well-warmed establishment. This building soon revealed the proportions of a palace.

Then all my doubts ceased. They were bringing me into the presence of the Emperor, the Emperor who sent for me, an obscure ensign, almost hidden in the lower ranks of the Guard. I remember the story of the young ensign whom he had noticed in the street and placed behind him in his carriage, appointing him successively, in less than a quarter of an hour, lieutenant, captain, major, colonel, and general; but I had no hope that he sent for me with the same intention.

However, we arrived at last before another door, in front of which a sentinel was pacing up and down. My guide put his hand upon my shoulder, and said to me, "Keep up your courage; you are going into the presence of the Emperor." Then he whispered something in the ear of the sentinel, and the latter moved to one side. My guide opened the door, not by putting the key in the lock, so far as I could see, but by some secret means.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

A man of small stature stood before me. He was dressed in a Prussian uniform, with boots that reached above his knees, and an overcoat that touched his spurs, and wore a gigantic plumed hat. I recognised him as the Emperor. It was not difficult; he reviewed us every day, and I remembered that at the review of the day before he fixed his eyes upon me, called my captain from the ranks, asked him some questions in almost a whisper, while looking at me, and then spoke to an officer of his staff in a tone in which one gives an absolute order. All that only increased my nervousness.

I recognised him as the Emperor.

"Sire," said my guide bowing, "this is the young ensign whom you desire to speak to."

The Emperor approached, and, as he was of small stature, he raised himself on the point of his toes to look at me. No doubt he recognised me as the man he wanted, for he made a sign of approval with his head, and then whirled round, and said, "Go!" My guide bowed, went out, and left me alone with the Emperor. I assure you I would almost have preferred to be left alone in an iron cage with a lion.

His Majesty at first appeared to pay no attention to me. He walked up and down, taking long steps, stopping now and then before a window with a single pane of glass, and opening it to breathe the fresh air. Then he returned to his table, upon which his snuff-box was placed, and took a pinch of snuff.

This was the window of his bed-chamber, the room in which he was afterwards killed, and which, they say, has remained closed ever since. I had time to examine it thoroughly. Near one of the windows there was a desk, and on the desk a sheet of letter-paper. At last the Emperor appeared to notice me. As he advanced towards me his face had a perfectly fiendish expression, although, in reality, that was only the result of his nervousness. He paused in front of me:

"Dust," said he, "you know that you are only dust, and that I am everything."

I don't know how I had strength enough to reply: "You are the elected one of the Lord, the arbiter of the destiny of men."

He grunted, and, turning his back upon me, began once more to pace the room, and, after opening the window as before, and taking another pinch of snuff, he returned to me for the second time.

"And you know, too," said he, "that when I command I must be obeyed implicitly, without observation and without comment."

"Just as one would obey God; yes, Sire, I know that."

He gazed at me. In his eyes there was such a strange expression that I could not stand his glance. He seemed pleased with the influence that he exercised over me. Then he went over to his desk, took up the letter, read it carefully, folded it, put it in an envelope, and sealed this envelope, not with the Imperial seal, but with a ring which he wore on his hand. Then he returned to me.

"Remember," said he, "that I have chosen you out of a thousand to execute my orders, because I have thought that by you they would be well executed."

"I will always have in my mind the obedience that I owe to my Emperor," said I.

"Very well. Remember that you are only dust, and that I am everything!"

"I await the orders of your Majesty."

"Take this letter," said he, in a nervous and husky tone, "take it to the Governor of the Fortress, accompany him wherever he wishes to bring you. Be present at everything that he will do, and come back and say to me, 'I saw!'"

I took the envelope and bowed.

"I saw!" he repeated in a cavernous voice. "You understand?—'I saw!'"

"Yes, Sire."

"Go!"

The Emperor closed the door behind me, muttering the word "dust."

I remained stupefied at the threshold.

"Come," said my guide; and we again stepped out, but by a different road, which led to the exterior of the fortress. A sleigh was waiting in the courtyard, and we both got into it. The great door of the fortress, leading to the bridge of the Fontanka, opened and the sleigh started out, the horses trotting rapidly. We crossed the entire square until we found ourselves on the banks of the Neva. Our horses started out upon the ice, and, guided by the steeples of Peter and Paul, we crossed the river. The night was obscure, and the wind howled in a terrible fashion. I could hardly perceive, on coming again upon the other shore, that I was on solid ground.

We were now at the gate of the fortress. The soldier on guard took the countersign from my guide and allowed us to pass. We entered into the fortress, and the sleigh was stopped at the Governor's door. The countersign was given the second time, and we entered into the Governor's apartments, just as we had entered into the fortress.

The Governor was in bed, but they woke him up with the all-powerful command, "By order of the Emperor!" He approached, hiding his nervousness under a forced smile; for, with a man like Paul I., there was as little security for gaolers as for captives.

I gave him, without saying a word, the order of the Emperor. He brought it up to the candle, examined the seal, and noticed that it was the private seal of the Emperor, which was used for secret orders only. Then he bowed, and, after crossing himself rapidly, opened the letter. He read the order, looked at me, read it again, and then said:

"You must see! You have to see?"

"I have to see," I replied.

"Do you know?"

"No."

Then he remained an instant thinking.

"How many persons can your sleigh hold?"

"Three."

"Is this gentleman coming with us?" said he, pointing to my guide.

I hesitated, not knowing what to say.

"No," said the latter. "I will wait here."

"What will you wait for?"

"The close of the act."

"Very well; get ready another sleigh, select four soldiers, let one take a crowbar, the other a hammer, and the two axes."

The man to whom the Governor addressed these words went out immediately. Then, turning to me, the Governor said, "Come, and you shall see!"

He walked in front of me, lighting the way. I followed him, and a turnkey walked behind us. We proceeded until we came in front of the prison. The Governor pointed to a door, and the turnkey immediately opened it, passed in first, lighted a lantern and carried it in front of us. We descended ten steps, and found ourselves in the first section of the dungeon, but we did not stop there; we had to go down ten steps further, and even there we did not stop but went down five more, and there we stopped.

The doors were all numbered, and the Governor stopped in front of No. 11. He made a sign to the turnkey, without speaking. One would imagine that in this tomb people had lost the faculty of speech.

Digitized by Google

The door was opened and we descended six more steep and damp stone steps. Here we found ourselves in a cell about eight feet square. In the light of the lantern I saw a human figure move in this cell. We could hear a dull and strange rustling noise. I understood at once what it was, and whence it came. It was the water of the Neva rushing against the walls of the fortress. The cell was below the level of the river.

"Get up and dress yourself!" said the Governor.

I looked to see to whom the order was given, and, as the turnkey threw the light of his lantern upon a far corner of the cell, I noticed a thin and pale old man, with white hair and long white beard. No doubt he was put into that cell with the clothes he wore when he was arrested; but these garments had worn away, piece by piece, and he was now only half clad in a tattered cloak. Through the torn rags I could see his shivering and bony body, which, perhaps, at one time was dressed in splendid garments. Perhaps the insignia of the most noble orders were once fastened upon that fleshless breast. Now he was a living skeleton, without rank, without dignity, and even without a name. He was simply "Number 11."

He got up and wrapped himself up in his tattered old cloak without a murmur. His body was bent, broken down by long imprisonment, darkness and perhaps hunger; but his glance was still proud, almost threatening.

"All right," said the Governor. "Come."

The prisoner cast a final glance round his cell. For an instant his eye rested upon his stone seat, his water pitcher and his musty straw. He heaved a sigh! Great heavens! Could it be possible that he could regret anything there? He followed the Governor and passed in front of me. I can never forget the look which he gave me as he moved by, and the depth of reproach that was in that look.

"So young," he seemed to say, "and already at the orders of tyranny!" I cast down my eyes. That glance went to my heart like a poignard. How long had he been in that cell? Perhaps he didn't know himself. Probably he had ceased to measure the days and nights in the depth of that abyss.

He passed on and I walked after him. The gaoler followed us and carefully closed the cell door. No doubt it was needed for another. Outside, the two sleighs were ready. The prisoner was placed in the one that brought us. The Governor, myself, and the old man sat down—the Governor at his side, and I in front of him. The other sleigh was occupied by four soldiers.

Where we were going, or what we were about to do, I could not imagine. The affair itself was not my business. I was to see, and that was all. But, yes, there was something else; I had to say, "I saw!"

In the light of the lantern I saw a human figure move in this cell.

We started off. In my position I found my knees touching the knees of the old man. I could feel him trembling. The Governor was wrapped up in furs, and I was buttoned up in my military overcoat, and still we felt cold. The old man was almost naked, and the Governor offered him nothing to cover him. For an instant I had an idea of taking off my overcoat and giving it to the poor old man; but the Governor, guessing my intention, remarked, "It isn't worth while."

We had not gone far before the storm burst upon us with all its fury. The snowflakes became so thick that we were in danger of being lost in perfect walls of snow. At last we stopped, when, as I imagine, we must have been about one league from St. Petersburg. The Governor alighted, and approached the second sleigh. The four soldiers had already got down, each one holding in his hand the instrument he was ordered to bring.

"Make a hole in the ice!" said the Governor.

"Ah," muttered the old man, in a tone so strange that it might be taken for the unearthly laugh of a skeleton, "the Empress remembers me. I thought she had forgotten me!"

What Empress was he speaking of? Three Empresses had succeeded each other—Anne, Elizabeth, and Catherine. It was evident that he thought he was still living under one of them, and that he was ignorant of even the name of him who had decreed his death. What was the darkness of that terrible night compared to the years of darkness in his cell?

The four soldiers went to work. They cut the ice with their axes, and lifted up the block with their crowbars. Suddenly they jumped backwards. The work was done, the water appeared. "Get down!" said the Governor to the old man, turning to the sleigh where he expected to see him. The order was useless, for the old man had already come down. Kneeling upon the ice, he was praying. Then the governor gave an order in a low tone to the four soldiers, and returned and seated himself beside me. At the end of a minute the old man rose. "I am ready," said he.

The four soldiers seized him. I closed my eyes, but if I did not see, I heard. I heard the splash of a body thrown into the hole. In spite of myself I turned round. The old man was gone! I forgot that it was not for me to give orders, and I cried out to the driver, "Pachol! Pachol!"

"Stoi!" cried the Governor.

The sleigh, which had already started, was stopped. "All is not finished," said the Governor to me in French.

"What have we further to do?" said I.

"Wait," said he.

And we waited half an hour.

"The ice has again formed over the hole, your Excellency," said one of the soldiers.

"Are you sure?" asked the Governor.

The soldier struck the place with his crowbar. The water had already become solid.

"Now, let us go," said the Governor.

The horses started off in a gallop. One would have imagined that the demon of torments was pursuing them. In less than ten minutes we returned to the fortress. There I found my guide.

"To the Red Palace!" said he to the driver.

Five minutes afterwards the door of the Palace was opened for me. The Emperor was up and dressed, just as he was when I left him.

"Well?" said he.

"I saw!" was my answer.

"You saw? saw? saw?"

"Look at me, Sire, and you won't doubt it."

I was in front of a mirror and noticed my appearance. I was so pale and my features so altered that I scarcely recognised myself. The Emperor looked at me, and, without saying a word, took from the desk a paper.

"I give you," said he, "between Troitza and Pereslof a piece of land with five hundred peasants. Leave now, this very night, and never come back to St. Petersburg. If you speak, you know how I can punish. Go!"

I left, and never saw St. Petersburg again while Paul I. lived, and never before told a living being what I have now told to you.

Digitized by Google

The Fatal Letters

THE men at the club remarked to one another that Remington was making a mistake in marrying a girl hardly out of her teens. To Remington, however, they wisely said nothing, and many of them went to his wedding, which was their reward for knowing when to speak and when to be silent.

Remington was forty if he was a day. His hair was scant on the crown, and very white on the temples; and in a certain unbecoming light the crow's-feet about his eyes showed deeply. His figure, though, was youthfully slender, his step elastic, and he clad himself with the up-to-date taste of a University undergraduate. He was dignified, suave, and polished. By many he was deemed cold and calculating; but the many had not pierced the armour of his reserve. His wealth was enormous, which was sufficient of itself to make his bride envied by her sisters.

Louise Baldwin was as fair as a lily. Her education had been such that she came to him knowing as much about the management of a great establishment as a babe in arms. Her simplicity had been her chief attraction.

The first week of their honeymoon was spent in Paris, but her demeanour during the whole time was cold and callous.

Then they met some friends, and to Mrs. Remington the meeting seemed to be a glad one. Remington was not so well pleased, save that the association made a change for the better in his wife's mood. In their presence she laughed now and then, as she had been wont to do before the wedding, and the occasions when he chanced upon her gazing out of her window at the Hotel Bristol, upon the Column Vendome, with tears streaming down her pale cheeks, became fewer and fewer.

Her husband's efforts to win the love that he craved, and that had so mysteriously eluded him, were not aggressive. He adopted a course of passivity, but not of indifference. Not for a moment did he relax his attentions. Not a wish of hers, either spoken or implied, did he disregard. For six months they travelled about the Continent, frequently being in the company of those friends they had met in Paris and often in the company of others. It was, in fact, seldom that they travelled alone.

At Zermatt, under the shadow of the Matterhorn, they stumbled upon Remington's nephew, a brawny youth, who a few years before had rowed in the Oxford eight. He had not been in England for the wedding, but he remembered the bride very well indeed. He recalled that they had been neighbours when he was in knickerbockers; and he recollected distinctly the time when she and he, under the care of their respective nurses, trundled hoops in the local park.

Remington chose Zermatt, of all places in the world, in which to be laid up for three days with a bilious attack; and his nephew, Yorke Ledyard, endeavoured meanwhile to make his old playmate find the time hang lightly on her hands.

One day they travelled on donkeys to the Gornergrat; on another they walked to a mountain gorge near by; and the third, which happened to be Sunday, they sang together in the volunteer choir of the little English chapel that raised its cross opposite the hotel.

II.

LEDYARD spent the following winter in London. He was studying law in a desultory way, and he found he had much time at his disposal. A goodly part of it he passed pleasantly enough at his uncle's home, to which he had been given a key, with the information that a knife and fork always awaited him, and that the third floor front was ever ready for him.

Mrs. Remington was singing that January night, soon after their return, as he let himself in; and, drawing off his overcoat, he handed it to the footman, who had been drowsing in one of the carved hall chairs. Her voice came to him from the drawing-room, and it seemed to him, even then, as he stood straightening his white tie before the mirror in the hall, that there was something pathetic in its ring.

He sought her unannounced, as was his habit, and stood for a moment on the threshold, gazing at her, seated at the piano, before she was aware of his presence. He observed that there were tears in her eyes and instinctively his resentment rose against Remington, who, he believed, was responsible for them. She impressed him as very beautiful.

He had always thought her pretty, but there was something in the glow that the red lampshade shed upon her at that moment that reminded him of a portrait he had seen in the Luxembourg. A portrait of the "Duchess de M." it was marked, and he had gone day after day to stand before that picture and drink in its wondrous charm. He now thought that the reality with this suggestion was far more alluring than the original.

For a week Ledyard had been devoting himself energetically to the reading of law; but now, suddenly, all that he had read was gone from him, and in its stead had come this one figure—this woman that filled his whole soul. All his youthful spirits stirred within him. The resentment against Remington engendered a burning desire to recompense the wife for what he believed was her husband's neglect.

He stepped forward, and would have thrown his arms about her; but she looked up, with tears still trembling upon her lashes, and in her eyes was not what he had expected to see. There was confident reliance, rather than a longing for consolation.

"You have been crying!" he said, bluntly.

"Yes," she answered, without any effort at prevarication; "there is no use denying it. You can see for yourself—you are not blind."

"He has been unkind to you?" he went on, with a statement that was more than half question.

"No," she answered, "not unkind. I cannot say that he is unkind." And then she was silent.

He led her to a seat that occupied a corner of the room.

"Tell me," he pursued, taking her hand, "tell me what is the trouble. There is something wrong!"

She sat mute, her eyes fixed on the rug at their feet.

"I have heard the talk," he went on; "all the fellows at the club are saying, 'I told you so.' He was not the man to marry a young girl, as you are. You did not love him, as you should have loved him?"

Again it was a statement, but there was an implied question.

And she, wrought to a pitch that reckoned not the words, but spoke the truth, no matter who might be the hearer, responded:

"No! No! I did not understand. I was a child."

And then she fell to weeping again. Ledyard scarcely realising what he did, put his arm about her.

"Louise!" he urged. "Louise!" It was the first time he had called her by her Christian name, but he did not notice it; nor did she. "Louise! Don't. I beg of you. I cannot bear to see you unhappy. You——" and then, suddenly, "where is he?"

For a moment she did not answer.

"Where is your husband?" he again asked.

"I do not know," she said at last. "I told him to go out. I could not rest with him here, looking at me, contented, asking nothing, receiving nothing. He does not understand me. He made me so nervous. He drove me mad!"

Digitized by Google

Still she was sobbing. Yorke drew her closer to him. On his cheek he felt her warm breath.

"It was a mistake," he cried. "It is horrible! You were not meant for a man of ice. You were meant for me!" His lips were upon her mouth. She struggled for a moment, but he held her closely.

Again and again he kissed her. And then, when for a moment he relaxed his grasp, she did not try to escape him.

Round his neck she fastened her bare arms and returned him, kiss for kiss, every caress he had given her.

III.

IN the spring Yorke Ledyard went abroad. Mr. and Mrs. Remington decided upon Devonshire for the summer, and their cottage was gay with a life it had not known for years.

All the world heard, a few weeks later, how Remington, at the risk of his life and at the expense of a broken collar-bone, saved his wife from probably instant death, by springing in front of a pair of spirited horses which she had attempted to drive, and which had got beyond her control. The incident was telegraphed everywhere and the society papers commented upon the loss that the fashionable world would have suffered had not Remington rushed to her rescue.

There was, however, no mention made of the fact that from that moment dated the birth of a wife's appreciation of a husband.

Remington's patience was at last rewarded.

In other words, Mrs. Remington had suddenly fallen head over ears in love with her husband. That her love was not untinged with remorse added rather than detracted from its strength.

Again and again she was tempted to make confession of that which stared her continually in the face, as a ghost of her unhappiness. but she was far too timid, and valued her new estate too highly. She consoled herself by the reflection that although she had been tempted severely enough she had never been untrue to her wifely vows.

Remington was in the seventh heaven of bliss. He had waited patiently and confidently. At last he had achieved his reward, and he envied no man. A few months slipped away and, for what reason nobody knew, he appeared at the club one afternoon offering wine to everyone that would drink it. A few months more and Remington seemed at all times perturbed.

One afternoon a messenger came to him at the club, and, hurriedly excusing himself, he rushed out and took a cab home.

"It is all over," said the footman, who opened the vestibule door. "Perhaps, sir, you had better go into the library until the doctor comes down."

Remington made no reply. He threw off his overcoat and had his foot on the stairs when the doctor intercepted him.

"One moment," he said.

"Ah! yes?" returned Remington, controlling himself with an effort.

"A boy!" returned the doctor.

IV.

THE funeral was over. Mother and child had been buried in the same grave; and the father sat crushed and alone in the boudoir that his young wife had illumined with her fresh, rare beauty.

He had been sitting there for hours, with his head buried in his hands. Now he rose and turned on the electric light. He made an effort to throw off his despondency, and told himself that it was unmanly to give way to grief. He turned to her escritoire at his left hand, and drew out a drawer. He might, he thought, find here some recollection, some souvenir of their married life, before—and then he hesitated.

If, he thought, he could only find something among her treasures that would signify that she had loved him all these months. There was no question as to her subsequent affection; but he longed to think that while he was patiently waiting for some sign, she, too, had been waiting, with her heart overrunning for the love that he longed to bestow.

The drawer contained only blank stationery.

He drew out another. It was filled with bills that he knew nothing of, that she had paid from her own private account.

He drew out a third. There were letters there from her girl friends. He read several, in the hopes of finding some allusion to a love that he only suspended. But he found nothing to gratify him.

He drew out a fourth. It contained a bundle of letters, tied with a blue ribbon. From the packet he abstracted one. The envelope was addressed in a masculine hand. The inclosure was a revelation.

He glanced at the clock. It indicated twenty minutes to midnight. He descended to the hall, gathered up his fur coat, and went out without a word.

At the corner he found a cab.

"Drive me to the Vladimir!" he said.

Mr. Ledyard had just returned. Would the gentleman send up his card? No; the gentleman would not send up his card. He was sure that Mr. Ledyard would receive him; he would go up.

The boy on the lift noticed that the gentleman's lip was bleeding.

V.

MR. YORKE LEDYARD rose from his easy-chair with an evening paper in his hand. He had returned late, and had just taken time to glance over the day's closing prices. At the entrance to the room stood his sombre-clad uncle, a sheet of notepaper in his hand.

Neither spoke. The elder simply extended the sheet of paper, and the younger, scarcely realising the gravity of the action, took it, as invited to, and read it.

Remington waited patiently.

"Well," he said, evidently restraining himself to the utmost until Ledyard had finished reading, "what have you to say?"

Ledyard crumpled the paper in his hand and threw it upon the floor.

"Nothing!" he returned.

"You have no defence?" continued the widower.

"None. Think and say what you like of me, but no blame attaches to your wife," replied the younger man.

Remington was very cool. He took a step further into the room.

"Do you know," he began, "what this means to me? Do you know that that piece of crumpled paper lying there is the wreck of my life? Do you know that it has robbed me of every tender remembrance of the woman and child that I have buried to-day? Do you know that? Do you understand that? And do you dare to confess that you are the author of it?"

Ledyard was silent.

"Answer it!" cried the elder man, with sudden vehemence.

"I know it!"

For an instant the lights in the room swam round as in a vortex; a table was knocked over and went spinning to the wall; a rug was turned inside out; there was a fall, and then all was still. For fully a minute one man stooped over the other. Then he rose to his feet, and, going out, quietly closed the door.

. . . . . .

The investigation of the coroner is of necessity hasty. A verdict found in accordance with the evidence declared that Mr. Yorke Ledyard came to his death from heart disease, from which, according to the testimony of his uncle, he had been subject for years.

And the undertaker, who found the marks of four fingers and a thumb upon the young man's throat, receipted the bill, when Remington handed him a cheque, without so much as a sign that he disagreed with the verdict.

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS' TREASURE.

Illustrated by MR. A. KEMP TEBBY.

SUMMARY.

The mail train has been robbed between Cornwall and La Grange stations, and £20,000 worth of gold stolen by a gang of desperadoes, headed by two brothers named Mulligan. Two passengers on the train—Adolph Squirrek, alias Smith, a detective tracking the Mulligans, and Fred Weldon, a young lawyer—who have struck up an acquaintance on the way, alight at Somerville, where the former stopped at the "Drover," and the latter at his mother's house. During the night a message comes to say that Judge Woodland's horse has come back alone, and Weldon, together with Squirrek and two other men set out to find him, and discover one of Mulligan's confederates lying senseless on the road. The man, who had made an unsuccessful attempt on the life of the judge, is sentenced to forty years' imprisonment. At Judge Woodland's Weldon meets a Spaniard named Alvarido Almanaz, and the two men become rivals for the love of Florence, the judge's daughter. Weldon is inveigled to a lonely bridge near Cornwall, and disappears. Squirrek pays a fruitless visit to the spot.

CHAPTER XII. (continued).

The stranger listened very attentively during the recital of my pleasant yarn about the lost sermons, and I could see that he swallowed it all. It is not probable, at the first sight of me, that he suspected anything more than that I, Squirrek, was some friend searching for the body of Weldon.

A vast deal hinged upon the man's answer to my next question.

"I suppose, perhaps, the package fell into the stream, and has floated further down into the wood. Do you think there is any use in my searching further in that direction?"

Now, if he had said "No," it would have looked very dark for Frederick Weldon; in fact it would have said, "His dead body lies in that direction, and you will find it there, or at least you will discover enough to learn his fate."

But the man, without hesitation, replied: "Perhaps it is, and perhaps it isn't. It won't do any harm for you to look."

There was more in that reply than the man imagined, for it satisfied me that Frederick Weldon was still alive, although as to where he was, or what he could possibly be doing, was a matter of conjecture.

I hesitated awhile, undetermined whether to go further down the creek or not; but, on second thought, I ventured down, my country-looking friend going with me to look for the package of sermons, which I was pretty sure he would not find.

As may be supposed, I used my eyes with the keenness of a Comanche Indian; but I absolutely failed to discover anything, and, after going a distance of several hundred yards, I heaved a great sigh.

"I suppose these sermons will never be found again. The fact of it is, I don't believe he dropped them here."

I dropped in incidentally at his mother's.

"Maybe he sold them?" ventured my companion.

I smiled at this desperate attempt at a witticism, and putting on an expression of lugubrious alarm, I said:

"I tell you what, I begin to feel a little frightened."

"What about?" he asked.

"Haven't you heard of those dreadful men, the Mulligan brothers? They say they live somewhere about here, and only a little while ago they stopped and robbed the express train."

I scanned the counterfeit farmer, who scanned the counterfeit minister as closely; and, as each did his utmost to conceal his thoughts, it isn't probable that either was particularly enlightened. At any rate, I am certain he had no suspicion of the object of my question.

"I b'lieve there is such a gang," said he, "but I don't know anything about them. You ain't looking for anybody, are you?"

"Bless me!" I gasped, staring wonderingly at him, "what do you mean?"

"Nothin'. I didn't know but what you might be searching for some one."

"I'm afraid there will be some of the Mulligans searching for me," I returned, "so I'll leave."

As I turned about I saw the fellow's black eyes fixed searchingly upon me, as though a faint glimmering of the truth was creeping through his brain. He also changed about, and, side by side, we walked up out of the ravine, through which flows Devil's Creek.

If I could have felt certain that there was no one within call, I would have told this scoundrel plainly that a crime equivalent to murder had been committed there, and he knew all about it.

If he had attempted to bluster, I would as lief have put a bullet through his head as smoke my cigar, and it would have made the final extirpation of this gang so much the easier.

My object was now to draw him from the ravine as far away as possible, so that if any coup d'état should come about, I would have a clear track to Cornwall, without any danger of being thrown down the embankment. In my experience I have been compelled to give leg bail more than once, and have always found it a good thing to have the track clear ahead of you.

I think if I could have induced my companion to accompany me a few hundred yards further, an affair would have occurred which would have ended in a final extinguishment of one of the Mulligan gang; but unexpectedly he bade me good-day, and moved abruptly away.

I walked back to Cornwall, from which place I shall take the first train to Somerville, where I see a prospect of picking up and uniting a broken thread in this web of crime.

SOMERVILLE, FRIDAY.—I had a faint hope of finding my friend Weldon in this town, but was disappointed. He has not been here for a week, but as yet no concern had been excited by his absence. I dropped in incidentally at his mother's, who is a good, genial soul, and who received me with the politeness of a lady of the old school.

Her son, she said, was in Brampton, in his office, and would not be home for several weeks, as he told her he had important business on hand, which would probably keep him there longer than usual. But he writes home regularly every week, and she was looking daily for a letter.

To keep her mind at ease I will drop her a few lines from Brampton, with his name signed, the next time I am called to that town. His hand is easily imitated, and it will be an act of kindness towards her, although it may make some trouble if the poor fellow has really gone under.

Digitized by Google

The evening is a mild and pleasant one, with a bright moon, and my next point is Judge Woodland's, where I am to hunt for the broken thread.

CHAPTER XIII.

FLORENCE HAS A VISITOR.

(From the Journal of Florence Woodland.)

SATURDAY, October.—I had a strange call last evening. Mr. Smith, a ministerial-looking gentleman, who is an old friend and acquaintance of father's, came to the front door at quite a late hour, and inquired who of the family were at home.

Father was away at Meltonville, and doesn't expect to be back until this evening. When informed of that he asked to see me.

When I came in I found him looking over my album. He proved to be very polite and entertaining, and after several inquiries regarding the health of father and myself, he began a general conversation, in which he showed such learning and information, that I was as much delighted as surprised. He has travelled from one end of the country to the other, and when I expressed some wonder at his cause for doing so, he admitted that he had been a spy for General Grant during the war, and he related a number of his adventures in such a manner that I listened like one charmed for fully two hours.

He held my album in his hand.

Then he made some reference to Frederick Weldon, and complimented him so pointedly—all the time looking keenly into my face—that I am sure I showed considerable embarrassment. He interested me greatly in the old playmate of my childhood, for whose talents and nobleness of character I always held the highest respect. Indeed, he brought him so prominently before me that I dreamt of him, and, singularly enough, it was as my plighted husband. Strange!

All this time he held my album in his hand, now and then looking casually in it. Finally, he remarked that he observed a beautiful piece of penmanship, but the words were in a language which he did not comprehend.

Upon looking over his shoulder I saw that he had it open at the place where Señor Almanaz had written, under my name, the well-known quotation from Don Quixote:

"A ella no la llega Elena, ni la alcanza Lucrecia, ni ostra alguna de las famosas mujeres, que viéron en las edadas pretéritas, griega, latina, ó barbara."

"If the sentiment is as beautiful as the penmanship, it is creditable to him certainly."

I translated it, "She is unexcelled by Helen, unrivalled by Lucretia, or any other heroine of ages past, whether Grecian," etc., etc., remarking at the same time that it was distasteful to me to repeat such hyperbolic flattery.

He then leant towards the lamp, scanned it very narrowly, glanced through the book in an indifferent manner, and laid it away. A few incidental inquiries regarding my Cuban friend followed, and then he bade me good evening, apologising for having remained so long.

In recalling the interview, I find that it leaves one name in my thoughts—Frederick Weldon.

Since his departure from Somerville I had almost lost sight of him; but I now see him as he was when a boy—handsome, talented, and chivalrous. He it was who carried my books to school for me; who helped me in my lessons; who was respected by his teachers, and loved by his playmates; who carried off the first prizes, and who bore his honours so modestly that none felt envy, but rejoiced in his success.

He it was who was the means of saving the child of the Widow Elsington, when her house was burned, and there was no man dared to climb through the fire and smoke to the blazing room. I can see him now, when he was only a boy, as he held the little one in his arms, and made his way over the flaming roof to the ladder, while we all shuddered and held our breath in an agony of fear.

But what does this mean? Surely my pen is wandering strangely—my mind must be still more out of its usual course.

CHAPTER XIV.

MR. SMITH GETS A WARNING.

(From the Journal of Adolph Squirrek, Detective.)

WEDNESDAY, October ——.—Eureka! I have it! The broken thread has been found and joined. Suspicion has become conviction, and a great obstruction is cleared from my path.

Events have crowded each other in such rapid succession that several days have passed before I could find time to take my pen in hand, and for some time I have been a sort of comet on its travels.

I found Florence Woodland a charming lady, and I can comprehend how a young volatile fellow like Fred Weldon should lose his heart entirely in her presence. The emotion of love, except in an incidental way, doesn't come within my province, yet it was no mistake of mine when I say a lurking fondness for the young man displayed itself during our interview. There is a clear field for him, the only danger being that of an ardent admiration for the handsome Cuban, Almanaz, upon the part of the young girl.

The admiration was duly magnified, as I discover from the private journal of my friend, who finally gets the suspicion that the señor is a detective working to accomplish the same ends with myself. If the black-eyed foreigner is such a character, he has thus far managed effectually to conceal it from me.

Upon reaching Brampton I sat down and penned a few lines to Mrs. Weldon, purporting to come from her son; but on second thoughts I concluded to destroy the note, as I can see, from the shape matters are taking, that it would seriously embarrass my plans. Much as I regret it, I fear the parent must undergo great agony in order to assist us in the recovery of her child.

From Brampton I reached Cornwall late on Saturday night. On Sunday, as is generally my custom, I attended divine service, and rested and thought.

Fred Weldon has not been missed yet, and several weeks may pass before his disappearance will attract the notice of his friends, except from the fact that it is known that he is a marked man

The only method of extirpating this gang is by organising a vigilance committee, and the moment is close at hand for doing it. There must come a sudden gust, a whirlwind that will set the community on fire, their passions must be roused to the fever heat, and these men must be hunted like wolves.

Digitized by Google

This will end on the Mulligan gang, as they are generally known, but it will not reach them all—it is my work to add the finishing touches.

Feeling dissatisfied with the survey I made of Devil's Creek, I visited the place again on Monday. I passed several hundred yards up and down the stream, but discovered nothing out of the way, and did not even get a glimpse of my quondam acquaintance, the burlesque farmer.

But as I climbed up one side of the railway bank, a tall man did the same on the other side, directly opposite, and coming face to face, I recognised my gorgeous friend, Señor Almanaz.

The man was plainly surprised at seeing me here, and showed some embarrassment. As we have never been on very intimate terms, he merely lifted his hat, and walked down the line, while I took the opposite course towards Cornwall.

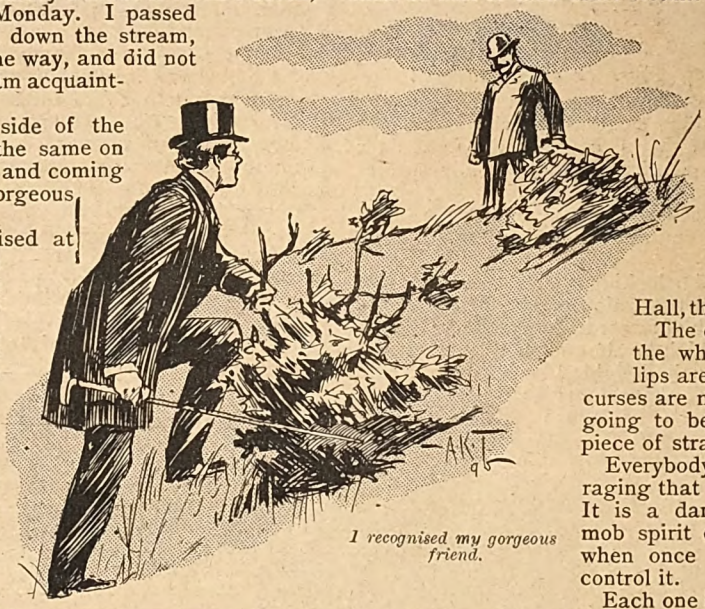
Reaching my hotel, I found a letter shoved under my door, which must have been placed there while the señor and myself were exploring the mysteries of Devil's Creek.

It contained only a few lines, but these were to the point:—

"Mr. Smith is hereby warned that his errand in this part of the country is understood, and that if he remains three days longer his fate will be that of his friend Weldon, and all others who make the attempt that he did."

The letter gave me great consolation, for it proved conclusively that Fred Weldon is alive, and is held somewhere as a sort of hostage, to be used in some contingency.

The time has come to strike!



I recognised my gorgeous friend.

CHAPTER XV.

THE VIGILANCE COMMITTEE.

THURSDAY, November 1. When the town of Cornwall rose this morning they found the fences, houses, gate-post, and every available place, covered with the following flaming posters:—

"Citizens, Arouse! — The time to strike has come! No man is safe! Crime stalks on every hand! Our brothers are murdered — unless checked it will soon be our turn! You all know what murders have been committed during the last few months. Frederick Weldon has been spirited away by the same red hands and Mr. Smith, his friend, has been warned that if he does not leave the country his fate shall be that of their other victims.

"Citizens! The Mulligan gang have put the last feather upon the camel's back! We have borne this too long! Let us band together, and swear not to stop until these wretches are hunted from the face of the earth!

"All in favour of organising a vigilance committee for the purpose of going to work, will meet at the Town Hall, this forenoon, at ten o'clock."

The excitement is at fever heat; the whole town is boiling over; lips are pressed, brows are knitted, curses are muttered, and I see there is going to be practical results from this piece of strategy.

Everybody is furious, everybody is raging that this has gone on so long. It is a dangerous thing to rouse the mob spirit of the American people, for when once aroused no one man can control it.

Each one is wild at his neighbour and wild at himself that they have been such cowards as to permit all this. If I should go in the street, and attempt to say a word in favour of the Mulligan gang, I would be torn limb from limb. If the outlaws have any friends, let them beware, for the murmuring I hear on every side is the subterranean warning of a Stromboli.

The first outburst has already taken place. An old man was selling vegetables at the corner, when a savage-looking fellow began bartering with him. The farmer could not avoid making a reference to the all absorbing theme of the outlaws and posters, whereupon the stranger said the Mulligans would soon settle all who had a hand in the business.

The words were scarce out of his mouth, when the farmer struck him a fierce, sudden blow, and at the same instant a shout was raised that he was one of the outlaws. In a twinkling a crowd was swarming round him, all yelling for his death. He struggled desperately, but, finding it useless, he started to run. He was fleet of foot, and might have made his escape, had he not been felled by a stone hurled at him. Before he could rise, he was set upon, and ten minutes later he had a rope round his neck, dangling from the sign of the hotel where I was stopping while in this town.

The excitement is at fever heat.

Digitized by Google

Felled by a stone hurled at him.

I went down and took a look at him. He proved to be the farmer, with the hoe on his shoulder, that I encountered the other day at Devil's Creek, so there is the satisfaction of knowing that the mob made no mistake in their victim.

Long before the hour of ten o'clock such a seething multitude had gathered round the Town Hall that it was plain that not a quarter of them could enter it. No one knew who had put up the hand-bills, and, seeing that the crowd needed a directing mind, I mounted a barrel, and shouted, "Fellow Citizens!"

In an instant every eye was upon me, and I heard the question, "Who is he?" repeated a score of times, in as many seconds. Had any one whispered at that moment that I belonged to the Mulligan gang, my life would not have been worth a rush.

"I am the Mr. Smith mentioned in the hand-bills," I shouted, and instantly there fell a hush upon them, and they were all my friends. "It is I who have been warned to leave this country, under pain of being put to death."

I then began a harangue. I pitched into the Mulligan crew and said that every minute's delay was a day's strength for these outlaws; that by this time they had learned of what we were doing, and they would be prepared for us; that we were already marked men, and if we didn't kill them, they would kill us.

Heavens! how that last remark had fired them up! It was like a torch thrown into a powder magazine. Men were darting hither and thither in search of arms. I called upon them to elect their leaders, and not to do it too blindly. Before I knew it they vociferously demanded that I should be their captain, and I consented, because there was no avoiding it, although there wasn't a man of them who had ever seen me before, except casually during the few days past.

The driver of the train, whose whistle was heard at the station, was ordered to wait fifteen minutes, until the vigilance company was ready, and upon repairing to the station, over a hundred armed men, many of whom had been veterans in the war, followed me while others tramped along in the rear.

I took a hundred with me, and ordered the driver to stop at the spot where the late robbery occurred, and let us out.

Those who could not go with us would not remain behind, and there must have been several hundreds who followed along the line on foot, behind us.

In the centre of the woods the train slackened, and disgorged my men. We were somewhere near the retreat of these outlaws, and were fully resolved to smoke them out.

It was known that the way to reach them was to follow up the creek, which led into swamp, but at this point we found ourselves somewhat at a disadvantage, as we had no boat, but I learnt from one of them, a daring young scout, who a few days before had explored the place at night, that the cabin in which they lived was upon a small island, only accessible by water.

The fever, which had maddened my men since morning, had had time to cool by this time, and I had them under control. I had appointed two lieutenants, the first of which was Belknap, the scout referred to, and the other a comrade, both of whom, it was evident, were very popular among their friends.

While we were discussing the best manner to overcome our disadvantage, an unlooked-for occurrence brought the solution.

CHAPTER XVI.

BEARDING THE LIONS.

SUDDENLY a small boat rounded a curve in the creek, in which were seated two men, with a negro rowing. I had not even seen them, when shouts were excitedly uttered by half my company, and as many fired a volley into the canoe.

Almost at the same instant Belknap leapt into the water and swam to the boat, the inmates of which, it was safe to say, were riddled with bullets.

Upon towing it ashore, the two white men were found stone dead, but the negro still breathed. Understanding that they were from the island, and, seeing that he could live but a few moments, I leant over him and asked him whether the Mulligans were at their cabin, but the faithful fellow shook his head and refused to answer. I then asked how many there were there, but he would not be caught. Then I put the most important query of all:

"Is there a young man held prisoner there, or do you know whether your men have any such person in their power anywhere, or whether they have killed such a man within a few days?"

He looked earnestly at me for a few minutes, and then opened his lips to speak. He did utter something, but I failed to catch it, and ere he could repeat the words he died.

Here were three of the Mulligan gang, counting the one lynched a few hours before, and omitting the negro, who Fired a volley into the canoe.

Digitized by Google

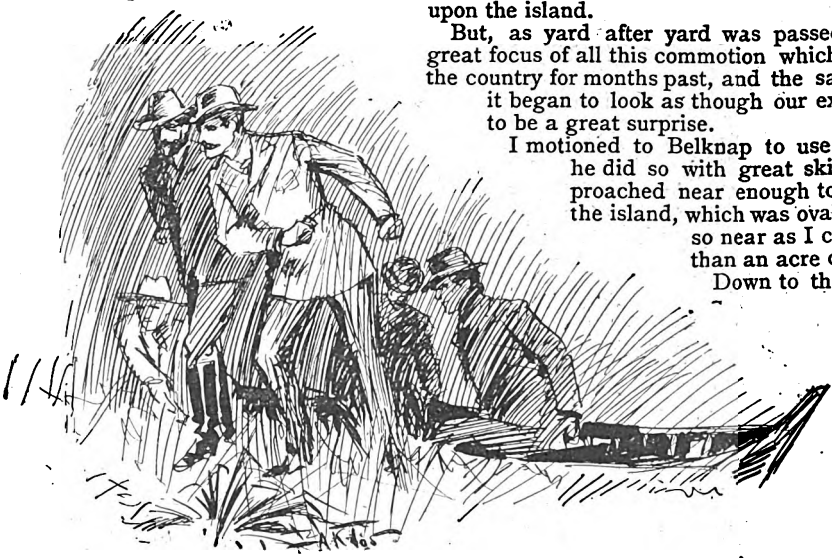
were already killed, and a fourth, "poor Tom Borie," secure in gaol, so that my friends were disposed already to look upon the work as half done.

Two plans of procedure were now discussed. One was to go back to Cornwall and secure a small cannon with which to bombard the island from the shore, a proceeding which would incur no personal risk upon our part, and at the same time be attended with sure results. The second plan was to go ahead.

In support of the latter it was argued that there could not be more than four or five men upon the island at the most, and what little risk there was to run in capturing them was not to be considered.

So the latter was agreed upon, and we began swarming and tramping up the marshy bank of the creek, Belknap somewhat ahead of us in the canoe, on the lookout for danger, and ready to apprise us of anything that might be descried.

The bodies of the two outlaws and negro were allowed to lie on the shore, near where they were shot. "Let the dead bury the dead," was the thought of each, "for we are after the living."



We stepped out like phantoms.

It was a long tramp up the creek, and at times I thought we should be compelled to give over the effort of forcing our way through the swamp; but we persevered, and after making several turns, Belknap held up his hand as a signal that he descried something.

Paddling cautiously back again he announced that the island was just ahead, but there were no signs to be seen of any person upon it.

"That amounts to nothing," said I. "If they were there, of course they would take pains to conceal themselves."

"I am ready to make straight for the island," he replied, "if half a dozen will go with me."

The whole hundred were ready, and, as leader, it never would have done for me to refuse, although there was no question about the rashness of this blind proceeding.

So I took my seat in the canoe, with five others, which sank it down to its gunwales, and Belknap headed straight towards the island. As we skimmed lightly across the smooth lake I am sure each one in the boat was reflecting upon the fact that we could not have made ourselves finer targets for those upon the island.

But, as yard after yard was passed, and we neared the great focus of all this commotion which had spread out over the country for months past, and the same silence continued, it began to look as though our expedition was destined to be a great surprise.

I motioned to Belknap to use his oars silently, and he did so with great skill. We had soon approached near enough to gain a correct view of the island, which was oval in shape, and covered, so near as I could judge, a little less than an acre of the lake.

Down to the water's edge grew a rank, exuberant vegetation, resembling the tropical luxuriance which I have seen in the Carolina swamps; but there were no trees, and we could barely discern the outlines of the cabin roof, where those famous outlaws had made their home.

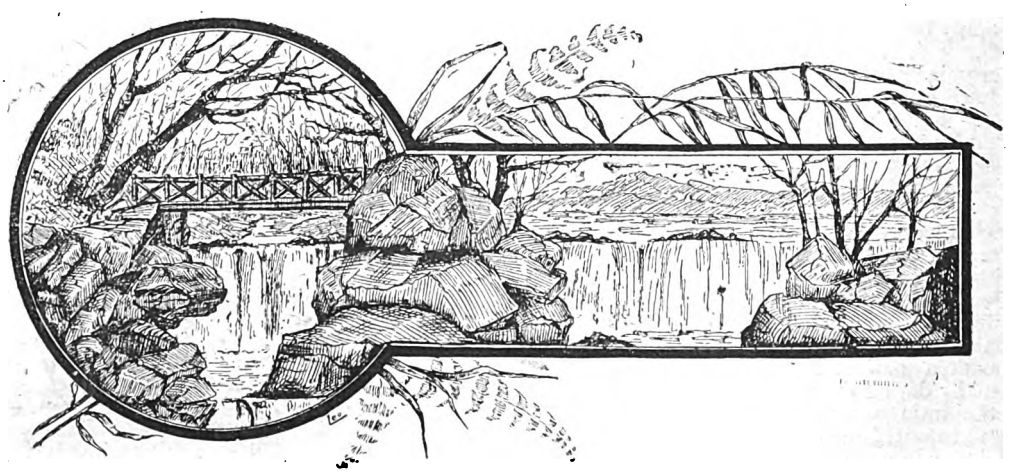
A silence rested upon the scene, which was made more impressive by the faint wash of our canoe against the current, and the soft ripple of Belknap's oar.

None of us spoke. All seemed to hold their breath in the intensity of expectation. A moment later the prow softly touched the green bank, and we stepped out like phantoms.

The Rubicon had been crossed, our bridges were burned behind us; there was no retreat, and if Dick and Tom Mulligan with their two desperate companions were there, a fight was inevitable—a fight that was to be "to the death."

Realising this, we carefully examined our rifles, and then headed by myself, moved stealthily towards the cabin.

(To be continued.)



Digitized by Google

Robin Hood up to Date

It was not for nothing that Charlotte d'Urlac had been a wife for five years. To-day, when she wanted anything from her husband, she set about it in the simplest possible way. A bit of a gourmand, he loved good cheer, and knew not how to refuse his wife anything when he had dined and wined particularly well.

Naturally, then, I say, when she specially desired something, she carried him off to some famous restaurant, and, the proper moment arriving—between two glasses of sparkling Pomard, or perhaps Yellow Seal—gently glided her confidences into his ear.

Well for more than a week now she had been revolving in her naughty head a project how to make her husband proffer her a certain beautiful little pin—three dainty, ruby-studded little beetles quivering on a golden stem—that she had seen in the window one day in passing Sarony's, and that would look so well, she thought, at her pretty throat, with a velvet love-knot tied beneath it.

Unfortunately, the trinket cost 300 francs, and the matter would truly be difficult to bring about. No matter; Charlotte was brave—"nothing venture, nothing have!" When Gerald returned from business that evening she baited her hook at once with the usual temptation.

"Only," she said, "let us try to-night the Restaurant Peter's, for nowhere else in the city can one find such lobster frappe."

Gerald objected a little at first, for the sake of form, but yielded graciously, and they were soon installed at a table for two in the Peter's Café, and busily engaged in discussing a dinner that this wise little woman, charged with the ordering of the same, had seen to it should be lacking in nothing.

Fifteen minutes after the opening consommé, and a slice of turbot, Gerald d'Urlac smiled like a new made bridegroom, found everything delicious, and his wife so unusually charming, that in spite of the five years of married life between them, beamed upon her like a lover and declared himself "almost ready to commit any folly for her."

"Good!" said Charlotte, smiling a little at the success of her ruse, "some day, soon, perhaps, Gerald, I'll remind you of that."

"As you like, dearest; but, see you, Charlotte, what are you plotting now in that sly little head of yours? No matter; pass me the truffle; we'll talk of this later on."

And the dining went on so beautifully that Master Gerald was decidedly in a good humour, when, all at once, he ceased to smile, set down his wine-glass hard, and said in an undertone to his wife:

"That man below there, to the left—why does he stare at us so? No, don't look; all the same, it's annoying."

The "man to the left," in fact, was only some two or three tables back, and dining alone. A very elegant gentleman, besides, but of an elegance a trifle suspicious, and under which the practised eye would have divined the adventurer.

"Oh, well, never mind," said Charlotte cheerfully, "try these entrées, Gerald."

But the charm was broken, the end of the dinner suffered and M. d'Urlac, his cigar well lighted, the change from a 500 franc note safe in his pocket, was ready to depart.

Charlotte was uneasy. Clouds were gathering on the domestic horizon—the risk, however, worth taking, she'd make at least the effort.

"Let us talk of it now," murmured she softly in Gerald's ear, "that folly you were so ready to commit for me; you are—you are willing still, I suppose?"

"Yes, yes, certainly—that is, if it's reasonable."

"Of course it's reasonable; only to go down the boulevard with me as far as Sarony's."

"Boulevard! Sarony's! But, Charlotte—ah-h, I begin to see!"

"What if you do, Gerald? Didn't you say, a while ago—but come on, come on, Gerald, do come on."

And Gerald permitted himself to be led, but without enthusiasm, from the café to the boulevard, and thence on till they reached Sarony's.

Charlotte breathlessly clutched her husband's arm.

"There," she said, "there, see for yourself!"

That beautiful little pin, all glowing and flashing with crimson splendour in the white light of the electric light!

But scarcely had Gerald set eyes on it and the price beside it when his wife saw him start.

"Three hundred francs, Charlotte, for a thing like that! It's madness, madness, my dearest, sheer madness! What could you have been thinking about?"

"But you said, Gerald, you said awhile ago——"

"I know, I know exactly what I said, but, of course, I meant a reasonable folly, Charlotte! And—and—300 francs, you understand. Come, come, dearest, we must go on——"

Just at this moment the crowd about the window gave a sudden surge, and Gerald d'Urlac fancied that he felt a blow in the chest. He wheeled about fiercely to find himself nose to nose with an elegant gentleman.

The elegant gentleman of the Peter's Café? Precisely; who, with a thousand and one excuses for his unavoided awkwardness, glided down the boulevard with a rapid step.

"How queer!" cried Gerald, as he vanished from sight, "that man was still at the table when we left the restaurant; he must have followed us. Charlotte"—a sharp suspicion flashing into his mind that possibly his wife's beautiful face had something to do with the pursuit—"our business is finished here. It is time to go home."

But Charlotte did not respond. Home or elsewhere, it was all one to her now. All chance of the pin gone, like a child whose caprice has been crossed and refused, nothing longer had power to please her. Mechanically she accepted her husband's arm, and they regained their dwelling without speaking a word, in the sorrowful disenchantment that always follows a pleasure that has missed its end.

. . . . . .

Scarcely, however, had they entered the house, the silence between them still unbroken, when Gerald uttered an exclamation.

"Charlotte! Charlotte, I say!"

"Well, what is it, Gerald? Why do you cry out like that?"

"My pocketbook's gone, my cards, my bank notes, all the change returned me at the restaurant—over a thousand francs in all!"

"This finishes it!" cried Charlotte, tragically. "Everything has gone wrong to-day. But how careless, Gerald, to have dropped the book from your pocket like that."

"Careless! Dropped it from my pocket! You've lost your senses, Charlotte. Stolen from my pocket, you should have said. That man at the restaurant—that man who ran into me in front of Sarony's—'twas he, 'twas he! I know it was he!"

"Pooh! Nonsense! You dropped it, I tell you—perhaps at the table, paying the bill."

"Maybe I did. At all events, I'll stop at the café on my way to the station."

Vain hope! Vain trip! Forty minutes later Gerald returned, with face gloomier than ever. The restaurant had seen nothing of the book, and the police promised still less of the thief.

Digitized by Google

"But for that pin, it wouldn't have happened!" cried Gerald angrily.

"And had you bought the pin for me, as I wanted you to do," Charlotte returned with equal fervour, "there would only have been 1,000 francs, less 300, for the thief to have stolen!"

"Good! Excellent! Admirably reasoned! But if you really think, Charlotte——"

"Nothing, nothing, whatever, save that I'm sleepy, that I'm going to bed; we'll continue the dispute to-morrow, if you will. Good-night, M. d'Urlac."

And Charlotte was gone.

At dawn, however, the discussion was recommenced. It lasted till breakfast time, and also through breakfast more and more stormy. They were still at table and still wrangling, when the bell was pulled violently, and the servant entered with a package for Mme. d'Urlac.

"Good gracious, Gerald, your papers!" Charlotte cried out, as the wrappings fell apart.

"By George so they are—minus the pocket-book! But, quick, go on, Charlotte. Is there nothing else—no word, no sign of any kind?"

"Yes, how odd, and—and a little box—my pin, my beetles, Gerald!" throwing up her hands with a cry of bewilderment, "and see—a note with it!"

And Charlotte began to read it feverishly.

"MY DEAR MADAME,—Once upon a time, as you doubtless remember, recalling history, there was a certain bandit of a certain century, who possessed at least the virtue of being gallant. He ruthlessly robbed men, it is true, but never a lady, particularly those that had youth and beauty as great as your own. Robin of the Woods' case was my case also. Briefly, I have robbed your husband—a man—but to you, a lady, I beg leave to offer this little trinket I know you greatly desire, since I stood immediately behind you when you vainly besought M. d'Urlac to give it to you—beg leave to offer you, I repeat, this little trinket, in testimony of the great respect I feel for all your sex.

"Such ungallant conduct on the part of a man and husband required a lesson. I have, therefore, no remorse in retaining for personal use seven hundred and odd of the thousand and odd francs contained in the pocket-book. The three hundred others, be good enough to explain to him for me, having permitted a great criminal to repair, in a measure, the wrong committed by an honest man. The book itself—a very convenient one, by the way—I also retain, but herewith inclose the papers and cards of which I should be grieved to longer deprive M. d'Urlac.

"Pray believe me, Madame, in the sentiments of respectful humility, &c., &c., "THE GUILTY MAN."

"And also, Charlotte, if you please," cried Gerald d'Urlac, with eyes from which amazement and mirth had long since driven the anger, "in the respectful humility of a fool; for fool I was that I did not then, and do not always give in to your caprices. Heaven wills that wives and women will, and husbands always have to pay the piper. Come, kiss and be friends."

A PRECIOUS RELIC.

"BUT, uncle, I love Rose!" I protested once more.

"Go about your business."

"Give her to me."

"You will weary of her!"

"I would die for her!"

"You would soon be consoled."

"But——"

My uncle turned from me, as red as scarlet, and struck his fist upon his desk. "Never!" he cried. "Never! Do you hear me?"

I looked at him with supplicating eyes and clasped hands, while he continued: "Look at this nice husband, who is penniless and thinks already of beginning housekeeping. A pretty mess I should make to give you my ward, who is to inherit all I have! I have said no, and it is useless for you to try to make me say yes!"

I insisted no longer. I knew that my uncle was the most headstrong of men.

I simply heaved a deep sigh, and resumed the scouring of a long gun covered with rust.

This memorable conversation took place one morning in summer in the shop of my maternal uncle, an established dealer in antiquities and objects of art, in Wardour Street. It was a shop having an excellent patronage, and it was a veritable museum.

On its walls hung faiences from Marseilles and old Rouen, while opposite them were old coats of armour, sabres, guns, and boxes of pictures. In all directions were old sideboards, chests of all sorts, statuettes of saints, armless or legless for the most part, or from which the gilding was fast fading; books, large and small; all forms of lachrymatories, tiny urns, rings, precious stones, fragments of marble, bracelets, crosses, necklaces, medals, and little images in ivory, whose yellow tint would appear for an instant in the sun to have the transparency of real flesh.

The shop had belonged to the Stimsons from time immemorial. It had passed regularly from father to son, and my uncle, according to what his neighbours said, ought to be pretty well off, for, besides his business, he held office for the County Council. He was a large, fat man, short of limb, very quick-tempered and headstrong, but not unkind in the main. Such was my Uncle Stimson, my only relative on earth, who had educated me, and then raised me to the dignity of first and only clerk in his shop.

But my uncle was not only dealer in antiquities and clerk of the County Council. He was also, and above all, the guardian and sole protector of the beautiful daughter of an old friend, who had left her to him. Her name was Rose, and I was hopelessly in love with her. And do you ask, how did she look? Why, what shall I say? Is not the one we love always beautiful, and does she not seem to be the best of all good maidens? I loved Rose with my eyes, as with my heart; and, to tell the truth, I knew that I was not displeasing to her. It seemed as if we had always loved each other, since the far-off times of the holidays, when I had picked for her the most beautiful flowers of the garden, or when, seated on the grass, we took our lunch together.

I return now to my uncle, who, at my side, without heeding my sighs while I continued to clean my long gun, was examining, glass in hand, a lot of old medals, brought in that same morning.

Suddenly he raised his hand. Five o'clock struck.

"Ah, that reminds me," said my uncle, "that I must go to the station to get a parcel which was to come to-day."

Rising, he put the glass upon the table, and called, "Rose, my stick and my hat!" Then turning towards me, "As to you"—he spoke very low and very rapidly—"do not forget our conversation. If you think to force me to say yes, try it; but I doubt your ability. In the meantime, not a word to Rose, or believe me, I will put you out of the door immediately."

Rose quickly entered, bringing the stick and hat, which she held towards her guardian; he kissed her upon her forehead,

Digitized by Google

then, casting on me a last eloquent look, he went brusquely out. I continued to burnish my gun. Rose gently approached me.

"Why, what is the matter with him?" she asked. "One would think he was angry with you!"

I looked at her. Her eyes were so dark, her expression so angelic, her lips so rosy, and her teeth so white that I told her all my love, and of my demand and my uncle's brutal refusal.

Rose answered nothing. She lowered her eyes and blushed like a cherry. I stopped. "Are you angry with me?" I asked trembling all over. "Rose, you do not wish to have me for a lover!"

She extended her hand to me. Then my heart bounded, and my head took fire. I cried, "Rose, I swear to you I will be your husband!" As she shook her head, looking at me sadly, I added, "Oh, I know my uncle is obstinate, but I will be more obstinate than he! I will force him to say yes!"

"But how?" asked Rose. It was just there that the difficulty lay! No matter. I would find a way. Just then we heard a step in the street. Instinctively we separated. I recommenced my scouring, and Rose, to keep herself in countenance, began to wipe with a corner of her apron a little statuette which rested on a cushion of faded velvet.

My uncle entered. He was evidently surprised to see us together, and looked suspiciously first at me and then at her.

We rubbed away vigorously, without raising our heads.

"Here, take this," he said abruptly, extending to me a large packet which he carried under his arm. "It is a superb purchase, you will see."

I did not care at all about it, but I opened the package. From its wrappings emerged a helmet—not at all an ordinary helmet, but a superb casque of monumental size, with a collar-band and pointed visor of singular shape. The visor was raised. I turned the helmet between my hands. My uncle approached. "Oh, it is impossible to shut the visor! The hinge is strained. The helmet is, nevertheless, a superb piece, and well burnished will have a beautiful effect. That will be your work to-morrow."

"Yes, uncle," I murmured, for I dare not yet raise my eyes to his face.

That evening I retired early to my chamber and went at once to bed. I wished to be alone, so that I might think things over. "The night gives council," is an old adage, and I had great need that the proverb prove true. In an hour or so I fell asleep. Not till morning did anything occur to me but indifferent dreams; then I had a strange vision. I saw Rose coming out of church in the lovely toilette of a bride. She wore an exceedingly tall head-dress, yet it was very pretty. Then suddenly the picture changed. It was moonlight, and there was a frightful crowd of helmets and old china, with my uncle brandishing a halberd in his hand and conducting a dance.

. . . . . .

The next day! Ah! the next day! I shall never forget it. Although I was madly burnishing the enormous helmet which had been brought in the previous evening, and grinding my teeth with rage, yet all my energy could not suggest to me a way out of my dilemma.

The helmet shone like the sun. My uncle smoked his pipe, all the while looking at me, but not a single idea came to my assistance. No plan had revealed itself to me to force him to yield to me the hand of his ward.

"It shines finely," he said. "Now leave it." I left it. A storm was brewing surely. Would it break on me? I determined to let it pass, if possible. Suddenly, seized by a strange idea, my uncle, taking the helmet in his hands, turned it round, studying all sides of it. "A beautiful piece, indeed, but my faith! it must weigh heavily on one's shoulders!"

I know not what good spirit impelled him, but he shook the helmet, put it on, and tightened the neck-piece.

Amazed, I looked at him. Certainly this head-gear was anything but becoming to him. At that moment the sound of a rusty spring which unbinds itself was plainly heard, and bang! the visor flattened, and behold, my uncle had his head completely shut up behind immovable bars, and the prisoner was gesticulating and crying like a heathen.

I burst out laughing. Indeed, my uncle, with his enormous girth and short legs, and with this casque on his head, was a grotesque spectacle.

He advanced towards me.

"The hinge!" he cried. "The hinge, imbecile! Did not you hear it crack?"

I kept on laughing, and could not speak a word. The helmet wriggled about so comically on his shoulders, and his voice sounded to me so queer from within it, while he was gesticulating and screeching and threatening me, that I could not stop laughing to save my life.

At this crisis two o'clock struck.

"The Council!" murmured my uncle in a stifled voice. "Get this helmet off from me as quickly as you can. We will settle our differences afterwards."

But happily an idea had come to me. I had become desperate. I responded, "No, I will not get the helmet off."

My uncle drew back thunderstruck, and again the helmet began to rock on his shoulders.

"No," I again responded with a firm voice. "I will not help you to take off the helmet until you promise to let me marry Rose."

From beneath the visor came forth no longer a cry, but a veritable groan.

"And if you will not give her to me," I added, "I will not only refuse to unclasp the helmet, but I will run to the door and call in all your neighbours. I will go to the County Council and report your condition to them."

"You shall perish upon the scaffold!" came in husky tones from beneath the helmet.

"The hand of Rose!" I cried. "You have said nothing should force you to respond yes; but respond yes you must. Decide quickly!" I cried. "Some one is coming."

"Oh, yes! yes!" murmured my uncle, "yes, but do hurry!"

"Your word!" "My word."

Then I went to him, and with a resolute snap of my finger unlocked the spring.

The visor yielded, the neck-band also, and the head of my uncle emerged from beneath, as red as a poppy.

It was time. A friend of my uncle in the County Council entered immediately.

"Come!" he said, on the threshold, "we are late!"

"I am coming!" responded my uncle, and without looking at me he took his hat and stick and went out.

. . . . . .

Alas! all my hopes now fled. My uncle would surely not pardon me.

That evening, when the dinner hour came, I sadly seated myself at the table opposite him. He ate without saying a word. I thought he was only waiting till dessert to give expression to his wrath.

Rose looked at me, but I avoided her glance. At dessert my uncle lighted his pipe, and raised his head with an air of decision. "Rose!" he called.

Rose approached. "Do you know what this great boy demanded yesterday?"

I trembled like a leaf. So did Rose.

"Your hand!" he continued, and then, "Do you love him?"

Rose lowered her eyes.

"Well!" continued my uncle, "in that case the matter is settled. Come here to me."

He began to laugh. "Marry her, then, imbecile, since you love her, and I give her!"

Rose and I cast ourselves into his arms.

"That is good, very good, do as you wish, and be happy, that is all;" but in turning he leant towards me and added, "I will not give her yet, silly fellow, unless that incident of the helmet remains a secret between us."

My word for it, I have never until now related it to anyone but Rose, my dear little wife; and if ever you pass along Wardour Street, come in, and in a place of honour in the old shop I will show you my uncle's helmet. We have never wished to sell it.

Digitized by Google

At His Mercy

It was my first table d'hôte dinner at the Hotel de Nice. As it was only nearing the end of October, visitors to the South were as yet few and far between, and of a distinctly uninteresting order. Whilst my eyes were straying over the elderly commonplace Darby and Joans gathered round the festive board, I began to regret my choice of a domicile, and involuntarily formed plans for beating a speedy retreat on the morrow.

I was what is known as a crusty bachelor, and, worse, of uncertain age. The former fact troubled match-making mothers more than myself, as my comfortable independence rendered me comparatively content, and I did not yearn for the joys of a fireside of my own and someone else to spend my money.

My greatest and most absorbing interest was centred in humanity. I was an ardent psychological student, and, in consequence, liked to surround myself with youthful society and watch the buds unfold, as it were.

As I disconsolately finished my bottle of Beaune—I was feeling very dull—a rustle of feminine garments attracted my attention, and, as I slightly turned my head, a stately lady, dressed in black, accompanied by a singularly pretty daughter, passed the end of the table and were accommodated with seats exactly opposite to me.

The experience of years at once told me that the younger lady would form a most interesting psychological study, and I immediately resigned all thought of giving up my room on the morrow and busied myself with attending to the small wants of my charming vis-à-vis. She could not have been more than nineteen years old, and her face was as sweet and innocent looking as a child's, though her principal beauty lay in her eyes, which were of a deep, intense blue, and very large and full, with a dreamy, unfathomable expression.

Later in the evening I smoked a cigar with the manager and in the course of conversation learnt that the lady in black was a Mrs. Hillyard, widow of a county magnate, and that she was wintering abroad for the benefit of her daughter—a highly nervous and delicate girl.

In the course of a few days I was able to render Mrs. Hillyard some slight service, and the acquaintance thus begun soon developed into a sincere friendship. She was a very chatty, well-informed woman, and I passed many pleasant hours in her society while silently pursuing my investigation of her daughter. The latter required a lot of knowing, and it took quite a month of constant intercourse with her before I felt that we understood each other. I discovered her to be an unusually pure-minded, and high-souled girl of a very quiet and reticent disposition. Her mother frankly confessed that to her she was a complete enigma.

"She has never been different, Mr. Blaine," she said, sadly; "it seems impossible to interest her in anything. From her earliest years she has been the same, and never took to romping or toys like other children. If I were superstitious—which, thank goodness, I'm not—I should believe that poor Evelyn was under some malign influence. When she was at a boarding-school her fellow pupils used to say that that far-seeing look she has in her mournful eyes betokened an early death or a tragedy. Of course, that is all nonsense; still, I would give a good deal to see her different."

I suggested that there may have been an unfortunate attachment to account for Miss Hillyard's despondency, but this her mother vehemently negatived.

"She has never shown the slightest partiality for any one," she resumed. "I only wish she would, for it might be the dawn of a new existence for her. She has had many admirers and several offers of marriage, but she has refused them all. She likes reading, though, not novels, as you may suppose, but what I call creepy literature; and if she has a real liking for anything it is music. I have seen her spellbound at a Paderewski recital or listening to an oratorio."

"Alas, we have no Paderewskis here to wake the sleeping soul," I observed, glancing round the stiffly furnished apartment and its inmates, some of whom, ensconced in armchairs, were sleeping, not wisely, but too well, as various stentorian snores testified; while others were absorbed in their game of chess or backgammon—clearly not an assemblage to interest a young girl. In point of fact, Miss Hillyard always made a rule of retiring to her own room immediately after dinner.

A day or two later I was smoking and lounging in the reading room, when I heard some one performing magnificently on the Erard grand pianoforte in the drawing-room. I don't set up to be a musician, or even to understand the art, but it would have been an unfeeling soul indeed which could remain unmoved at that glorious harmony of sound.

I threw away my cigar and sallied forth to see who the unknown genius could be, when, just as I reached the hall, I met Miss Hillyard at the foot of the stairs. The girl was completely transformed. Her eyes glittered with some strange emotion and a mist of unshed tears; her face was flushed crimson and her lips trembled. She passed me without recognition and I could see that her hands were clasped convulsively. She stole into the drawing-room so softly that the player was unconscious of her presence, and I, seeing how deeply she was moved, forbore to intrude, and took a seat in the vestibule instead.

When the music ceased I heard the sound of voices. The kindred souls had discovered each other. I do not know how long they remained together, as I went for my usual constitutional, and when I returned, the gong had already sounded for table d'hôte. If it had not been for my afternoon experience I should have marvelled at the change in my young friend. I had never seen her look more lovely.

She was dressed in cream, and wore a great bunch of red roses at her waist—the first touch of coquetry I had ever observed in her. I also noticed that the stranger had been placed on the same side as myself, a little higher up, and that he and Evelyn were constantly looking at each other. As her eyes met his a faint blush would steal over her face and she would look down confusedly.

After this I was not surprised to find that she no longer absented herself in the evenings. Mr. Gerard, the new-comer, proved unremitting in his attentions and music now formed the principal attraction of the drawing-room. He was certainly rather good-looking, of the bold brigand type, which some women find so irresistible, and it was easy to see that he soon obtained complete mastery over Evelyn, and that his will was her will.

Personally I never liked him, although he strove to ingratiate himself with everyone. To me there was something mysterious about him, and I warned Mrs. Hillyard not to let her daughter become too friendly. I am afraid she rather resented my interference, thinking herself capable of managing her own affairs, and so she drifted on to the rocks like many a good woman has done before her. She protested that the love of music was the sole bond between them, and so I let her have her way.

One afternoon I was standing in the conservatory which opened out of the drawing-room and was concealed by draperies, when I heard the sound of voices, which I immediately recognised as belonging to Gerard and Miss Hillyard. Before I had time to move, a fragment of their conversation reached me, which made me feel extremely uneasy. Gerard's tones sounded pleading, yet imperative and I could just see through a division in the drapery that her hand was closely clasped in his.

Digitized by Google

"You want money, and you must have it," I heard him say.

"I want money and I must have it," she repeated after him. Then their voices dropped to a whisper, but I had heard sufficient to give me food for reflection. Here was a girl environed with luxury, with a parent of undisputed wealth who never refused her anything, making confession of poverty to a man to whom a few weeks before she had been an absolute stranger. I decided to say nothing to her mother, but to await further developments quietly. But a new sensation was preparing, which, for the time, turned my thoughts in another direction.

For some time past a series of cleverly-planned robberies had taken place in the hotel, watches, jewellery, and cash had disappeared from the visitors' rooms in the most mysterious manner. Among the greatest victims was Mrs. Hillyard, who missed a splendid tiara of diamonds. The manager, who was a thoroughly honest, straightforward fellow, was greatly upset, the more so as Mrs. Hillyard had threatened to bring an action against the proprietors for the value of her property. As I had plenty of time on my hands, I promised to assist him in trying to discover the thief.

As a rule I never entered my room after dinner till I finally retired for the night, but on this particular evening I discovered that my cigar case was empty, and went upstairs to replenish it. The door was slightly ajar, and what was my amazement on walking in to see Evelyn Hillyard with my cashbox open before her and the contents in her hands.

I was too startled to say a word, and stood rooted to the spot inside the doorway through which she must pass. In silence I watched her drop the gold pieces into her pocket—there were but five of them—then she closed the lid, locked it with a key which she carried, and walked out of the room. Her eyes had the same peculiar expression that I noticed in them the day I met her on the stairs when Gerard was playing, and now, as then, she seemed quite unconscious of my presence.

This was a psychological study indeed! I felt it was well worth the £5 I had lost and more, too. I was greatly perplexed as to the best course to take in this most difficult position. The poor child was undoubtedly acting under the influence of the scoundrel Gerard; to expose her was out of the question. It would deal a death-blow to her mother and herself.

I determined to tackle Gerard, make him acknowledge his villainy, and return all the stolen articles which were undoubtedly in his possession. But in this I reckoned without my host, for the following morning the gentleman had gone. On making inquiries, I was informed that Mr. Gerard had received an urgent telegram summoning him to the deathbed of an uncle.

Poor Evelyn was very despondent all day, and her animation a thing of the past. I obtruded my society upon her very persistently in the hope of gleaning further information. I even asked her point blank where Gerard had gone, but she confessed herself to be in complete ignorance, and I am sure she spoke truly. He would soon return, she said, and he had promised to write. She also spoke accidentally of the wholesale thefts, and regretted the loss of her mother's jewels. I pitied her from the bottom of my heart for being such an expert criminal, and withal such an innocent one. I then and there made up my mind to track the real criminal, but as it happened I was saved the trouble.

After dinner I persuaded Evelyn to put on her hat and take a turn with me in the garden. It was a lovely moonlight night, clear as day, and with the soft balmy air redolent of roses. I was discussing the approaching Battle of Flowers with my companion, when she suddenly stood still, while a look of intense horror appeared upon her face and her eyes grew wild and unnatural. I could see nothing to account for her sudden terror, and was about to question her, when she gave a low wail of agony and fell unconscious at my feet.

It was a week before I saw her again, and then it was to say good-bye. She was altered beyond recognition and was only a wraith of her former self.

"You have been very kind to me, Mr. Blaine," she said simply, "and I feel that I owe you some explanation. You have perhaps guessed that Mr. Gerard was a dear friend of mine——" here she caught her breath and resumed with difficulty——"the night I was with you in the garden I saw a ghostly vision. Mr. Gerard stood before me, and as I looked he raised his hand and drew a knife across his throat—then I remembered no more." She shuddered violently as she spoke and sank exhausted into a chair.

"My dear child, why distress yourself with idle fancies?" I began, but she held up her finger to enjoin silence, and pushing a paper towards me said, "read that."

My eyes followed the paragraph, which ran as follows:—

"TERRIBLE TRAGEDY AT LIVERPOOL.

"Last evening, between eight and nine, a terrible tragedy was enacted in this city. The police having obtained a clue as to the whereabouts of the accomplished burglar, George Daly, alias Cecil Gerard, arrested the unfortunate man as he was about to embark on a large liner bound for New York. The criminal made a desperate resistance, and, eluding the officer's grasp, suddenly drew a sportsman's knife from his pocket, and before he could be prevented gashed his throat across from ear to ear. The occurrence was witnessed by a number of passengers, some of whom fainted, and the deepest gloom prevailed on board the Vulcan when she finally steamed away. A large quantity of valuables were discovered in the suicide's portmanteau, including a tiara of diamonds, several rings, watches, and other costly articles."

I passed the paper back in silence. It was dated the 7th inst. The terrible deed was committed on the very day and hour that it was witnessed by Miss Hillyard some hundreds of miles away.

Poor Evelyn! She and her mother left the same day for England, and I have never met them since. The unhappy girl was as utterly unconscious then as she is now of the part she herself played in the miserable drama. In a letter recently received from Mrs. Hillyard she states that her daughter has taken the veil, and the great iron gates of the convent of the Sacred Heart have closed upon her for ever.

Digitized by Google

Who Killed Paul Ferrol?

THE doctor paled; decidedly it was something more than mere embarrassment that caused his unwillingness.

"I have given it up, ladies," said he; "I have nothing more to do with magnetism."

"But why, why, doctor?" the pretty pleaders persisted. "Put us to sleep—one of us—you must, or tell us the reason why."

"Well, so be it," said he, at last, still visibly reluctant. "I will tell you why; it may teach you a lesson.

"Eighteen months ago," he began, "I went into the country to see a friend—we will call him Paul Ferrol, if you please. Though old comrades and devoted 'chums,' for a long time the chances of life had separated us, particularly his marriage, which, for certain reasons, had obliged him to live for a while upon one of his properties, situated, as I have said, in the depths of the country. But often and often my thoughts carried me—a trifle enviously, in the midst of my hard work—towards that forgotten corner, where his hours were passed in the quiet routine and bliss of a domestic life.

"Nor was I mistaken in the picture my fancy had drawn; peace, serenity, repose, breathed from the very trees, with their great moss-covered trunks, against which an old mansion leant in the mingled shade and shine of the sunny woods.

"Paul met me at the station. His wife I did not see till later—just before dinner, indeed—a beautiful woman, with dark, brilliant eyes, which flashed, when not shielded by the long curling lashes, with the light of burnished steel. She had a superb figure, and a complexion the tint and texture of old ivory, through which was flowing vigorously the rich red current of a healthy blood. Very, very beautiful she was, but oddly enough, as I looked at her I felt a sense of a deception somewhere under that fair exterior.

"We were not alone; another guest had arrived—a young man and a near neighbour. From the moment of his coming, too—or did I fancy that, also?—Paul seemed less genial.

"Dinner was nearly over when a chance word or question turned the conversation upon a subject no less absorbing then than now, ladies"—and the doctor bowed courteously to the circle of eager listeners closely clustered about him—"turned, I say, upon the subject of hypnotism and hypnotic suggestion.

"My friend, from the first discoveries, had watched the advance of these studies with the liveliest interest, and many and frequent had been the discussions between himself and his wife concerning them, she denying the phenomena arising from these experiments, and stubbornly pronouncing them humbug and charlatanism; and he affirming that strange things could and did happen, as he knew from his own experience.

"Forced to take sides, I was obliged to admit that I myself was deeply interested in these matters, and had witnessed things that I did not dare to doubt. She was still obstinate, still mocking; she would believe what she saw—no more, no less.

"'If Paul is a subject, as he declares,' said she, 'the thing, too, is easy enough; convince me you have done such things, as you say, by trying it here and now.'

"Paul was willing. I looked intently at him; his eyes wavered curiously away from my gaze; he was a marvellous subject and fell immediately under my will.

"We passed into the drawing-room, placed him in a chair, and I had not made six passes over his brow when he was in a sound hypnotic sleep.

"'Well, he is off,' I said.

"'Impossible! No!'

"She bent over him, called him, punched him—no movement; raised his arm—it fell inert like a log.

"'Quick, quick, suggest something!' said she, a strange eagerness showing suddenly in her face.

"'You would, perhaps, feel the proof stronger, did you make the suggestion yourself.'

"She appeared to think, murmuring half aloud: 'It must be an unaccustomed act, something unusual, that he cannot divine; that does not enter into his habit of life.'

"She looked about her. Near by on a table a magazine lay opened at a recent article on 'Hypnotic Suggestions,' a slender, mother-of-pearl paper-knife thrust between the folds. She turned the leaves hurriedly.

"'Ah-h, we have it at last!' said she, putting her finger upon a certain paragraph; 'an experiment just made—successfully, they say. Repeat it with Paul, and I shall be convinced.'

"The experiment was to suggest to the patient at a fixed hour a predetermined act—the act in this case suicide with some harmless object that the 'subject' should be made to believe a poniard.

"'Willingly,' I responded.

"She handed me the paper-knife. 'This is harmless enough, isn't it?' she said, yielding it to me with a charming smile; 'it wouldn't hurt a fly.'

"'Perfectly harmless,' and I held up the little pearl dagger before Paul's eyes.

"'Do you see it, Paul?' said I, slowly and impressively, 'this poniard here? Well, I am going to put it on that table yonder; to-morrow, when the luncheon bell rings — the luncheon bell, remember—you will come here, take this poniard and—kill yourself!'

"Then I roused him. He remembered nothing and felt nothing, only a little uneasiness concerning the act that he was to accomplish, and from which he was determined to defend himself.

"The evening finished gaily with a rubber of whist, ending at ten in order to give the handsome young neighbour—a silent listener to what had been going on—time enough to reach home at a reasonable hour.

"We were walking, Paul, his wife, and I, on the lawn next morning, when the luncheon bell rang. Paul raised his head, listened a second, turned brusquely, and re-entered the house. His wife had become very pale.

"'Come, quick,' said I; 'he has gone for that paper-knife!'

"She remained motionless.

"'To what good?' she said. 'I see already that suggestion has reason in it, for Paul has gone. He will come back.'

"I did not wait for her to finish; I hastened to the drawing-room, where my 'subject' had gone.

"I ran; I threw open the door, and Paul was there—dead, face downward on the floor—a dagger in his heart!"

"A real dagger, doctor!" cried the mistress of the house, laying her hand softly upon the doctor's arm.

"A real dagger, madam. I turned to the table—the little mother-of-pearl paper knife had gone. Who had taken it? Who had put the other—the real dagger—in its place?

"Heaven alone knows; but she, Paul's wife, and he, the neighbour who dined with us that night, were married ten months ago."

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"DELIGHTFUL" TREATMENT FOR CURING CORPULENCE.

The process of curing any physical disorder is so generally the converse of "delightful" that the use of this and similar terms in reference to Mr. F. C. Russell's new popular treatment for corpulency naturally attracts special attention. These terms are to be found in a large number of the letters included in the just issued 18th edition of Mr. Russell's little volume of 256 pages, "Corpulency and the Cure" (Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.) These communications are from persons of both sexes, and it is apparent that their number is represented by thousands annually, who have found in this system of treatment a safe, rapid, and permanent cure for excessive fatness. This testimony forms in the aggregate, indeed, a wonderful record of the rapid reduction of excessive adipose tissue, and those who have personal reasons for being interested in the subject should send to the above address 6d. stamps for a copy of Mr. Russell's notably suggestive little book. "I think the treatment most delightful," writes one out of a large number of equally enthusiastic correspondents. And the expressions "Admirable tonic," "Splendid stuff," "A delicious beverage mixed with mineral waters," are of constant recurrence in this singularly interesting correspondence. The details given by many of the writers of these letters as to the results of the treatment fully justify the use of such eulogistic phrases. It must certainly be delightful to experience the sensation of losing unnecessary and dangerous fat by pounds per week, and frequently stones per month, and that by the aid of treatment which simultaneously increases the appetite and renders its reasonable indulgence innocuous. The experience, too, must be rendered still more delightful by the knowledge, which may be gained from a perusal of Mr. Russell's book, that his preparation is a pure vegetable product, without any admixture of the mineral poisons which are too frequently administered. With a candour which also is delightful, Mr. Russell prints in his book the recipe for the preparation.

SUMMER HEAT AND OBESITY.

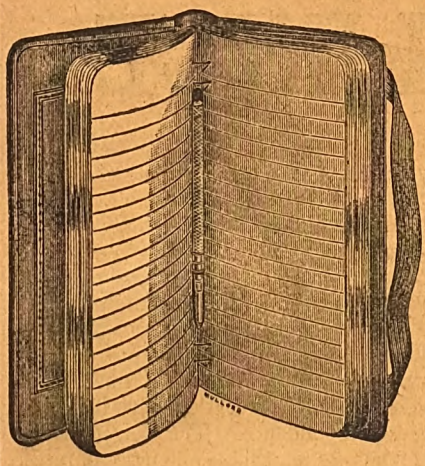
Summer heat, with the out-door enjoyments which come in its train, is a source of unmixed delight to all whose physical condition is sound. The full feast of pleasure to which hospitable Nature at this season invites mankind, is not, however, for those whose infirmities forbid them to undergo, without serious discomfort, a considerable amount of bodily fatigue. To those in particular who are the victims of excessive corpulence, the arrival of the genial summer warmth serves chiefly as a painful reminder that, for them, the delights of long woodland rambles, the climbing of mountain tops, and all the adventurous ways of flood and field are prohibited joys. The palpitating heart, the reeling brain, and the possible deadly sunstroke, which are the concomitants of obesity, banish all the pleasant anticipations which once came with the advent of the glad summer-tide. How much of this deprivation of enjoyment and positive misery is absolutely and easily avoidable, may be learned by consulting Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), a little work whose popularity is proved by the fact that its 18th edition has just been issued. This fact, too, indicates, in some degree, the wide area now covered by Mr. Russell's wonderful success as an expert in the reduction of excessive fat. His process, which is absolutely safe and pleasant, is so rapid in its operation that any over-corpulent lady or gentleman can easily get rid of all unnecessary weight in a very few weeks, so as to be able, before the autumn is with us, to enjoy the delightful feeling (and the appearance too) of renewed youth and energy. Mr. Russell makes no mystery of the nature of his curative preparation—apparently miraculous as are its effects in simultaneously reducing weight and increasing appetite—the consequently larger amount of food being consumed with impunity. He prints, therefore, his recipe in his singularly suggestive book, which may be obtained from Booksellers, or by sending 6d. stamps to his offices, Woburn House, 27, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

COLLINS'

"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK,

WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST AND THE BEST.

THE SIMPLEST AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register" the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,

Bridewell Place, London, E.C.; 139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,

Hyson Green Works,

NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

STORIES OF ALL SORTS FOR ALL PEOPLE.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 343. FOR WEEK ENDING JULY 27, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

WHAT IS THE NEW ART SET?

SIMPLY

A Tasteful little Box containing the following Requisites for Executing

Lovely Embroideries

Similar to those on view at SINGER'S numerous Showrooms :--

EMBROIDERY HOOPS.
ETCHING FOOT.
COLOURED STUDY.
TRANSFER.
12 REELS OF SILKS.
MANUAL OF INSTRUCTION.

AND A

LIST OF SILKS TO USE FOR VARIOUS DESIGNS.

It is the Neatest and Most Compact Little Article ever offered for Presentation.

APPLY AT ONCE FOR FULL PARTICULARS.

Digitized by Google

TOO STOUT.

Prof. Holt's "H.D." Pills for Fat People

A rapid, permanent, and absolutely safe reduction, averaging 5 lbs. weekly, with improved Health and Figure, and without dietary restriction, guaranteed to all (either sex). Will reduce weight and cure corpulency in the most stubborn cases where other treatments have failed. They are small, entirely vegetable, agreeable, harmless, and highly recommended. Price, post free, plain wrapper, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box. —Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, witnout having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
Gothic House, 9, Erskine Street,
Liverpool.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d extra. Herbal Institute, a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

Ottey's Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free. Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

ONE BOX OF

DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free, 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use

Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.

1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY,
Balham Hill, London, S.W.

Beware of injurious imitations.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES.

Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

TO INVENTORS.

An Invention Protected for £1. Handbook, "How to Patent an Invention," giving full particulars, forms, &c., free from Hughes & Young, "Patent Editors" to the principal newspapers, 23, Coleman Street, London, E.C. Established 1829. Inventors assisted in working or selling Inventions. Read "Patents."

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. Holt, (Rooms O), Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

New Harrison. Swift Gold Medal.

KNITTER

KNITS STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. List free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" & "SUN" Machines.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

TOOTH-ACHE CURED INSTANTLY BY BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

RED NOSES

caused by Indigestion, and all who suffer from this distressing and disfiguring complaint, should write to Dr. Howell, 22, Glasshouse Street, W., who guarantees a Cure in a few days.

HAIR DESTROYED

Root and Branch absolutely exterminated without injury to the skin, entirely new treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms.

Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticisms, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. Horn, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

OVER 2,000 New and Secondhand. EASY TERMS

—From 10s. per month. Lists (200 page) and Testimonials post free. British Cycle Manufacturing Co., Liverpool; 45, Everton Road, and 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W. (close to Euston Road).

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(really genuine)

in patent air-tight tins, ½lb., 1s. 2d., 1lb, 2s., 2 lbs., 3s. 9d., including tin and postage.

Mrs. CONYERS,
Kilkhampton, Shalton, N. Devon.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 343.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 27, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

IN THE CLUTCHES OF THE NIHILISTS

I WAS once a commercial traveller for a large London firm, trading between London and Russia—consequently I passed a considerable time in the latter country, chiefly in St. Petersburg. I have still many friends there, and speak the language as well as my own.

I became attached by degrees to the place, though, I must confess, at first I disliked it. Perhaps it was because it wasn't home, or perhaps because I had no real friend there. To tell the truth, I shrank from making one, as I knew before I had been many weeks in the country that every other man was a spy, and you might sit down and crack a bottle of wine with one whom you thought the jolliest fellow you had met, and next day be marched to prison, with your bosom friend of yesterday brought up as evidence against you.

I had been warned of this, and never encouraged intimacy with anyone. I was beginning to get sick of it all, and seriously thought of going home to England to seek other employers, when an event happened which changed all the current of my life.

It was the beginning of May, and getting very warm in St. Petersburg; so, after my day's work was over, I went down to the bathing-place, where in the hot weather I was accustomed to spend many hours. To-day I was not the only one there, as often happened; there was a young light-haired Russian enjoying himself in the water. It wasn't very long before I was following his example, and in about twenty minutes I was out again, drying myself and watching the gambols of this young fellow.

"He must be tolerably fond of bathing," I said to myself, "to stay in that ice bath so long;" for he was in it when I arrived, and how long he had been there before, of course I could not say.

I turned away to dress, and had put on my trousers and shirt, when I looked round to see if he was out yet or performing any strange antics; but he was no longer to be seen. I looked for his clothes, which were still there, but no signs of the bather. Good heavens! what was that? A hand surely! yes! And now another, and a head! and a murmured scream for help! To jump in just as I stood, half dressed, and haul him on land was the work of an instant.

He was practically unconscious, and till I felt his heart gently beating, I thought him dead; after, with much labour, rubbing, chafing, and administering brandy, which I providentially had with me, I got him into a carriage, and, learning his address from a card in his pocket, had him driven to his home.

All Rights Reserved.

I never shall forget the scene when, the cabman and myself helping the poor half-drowned fellow from the cab, the hall door opened, and his widowed mother and only sister came shrieking down the garden to the gate, fancying we were bringing his corpse.

In a few hours he was conscious and on the way to recovery. In the meantime the good people had insisted on my going to bed, and had ordered their man-servant to rub me well with brandy and swathe me in hot blankets.

Some time in the evening I awoke and found a complete set of clothing laid out for me; so, feeling as right as a trivet, I jumped up and dressed. Being dressed, I went out to inquire how the patient was getting on; and, as I opened my door, the one opposite opened also, and the mother came forward with both hands outstretched.

"Now you are yourself again, let me give you a mother's blessing for having saved her only son."

She then kissed me once on the forehead and twice on the chin, in Russian style, and added, "And now come to see Peter; he is doing charmingly, and cannot rest until he thanks his preserver."

We entered the room, and there, lying in bed, was the light-haired youth, looking more like what I first saw in the water than the corpse-like body I had dragged out with its flaxen hair clinging tightly to the face. Beside him sat the most beautiful girl I had ever seen. I couldn't stop the blessings and thanks they all showered on my head—so let them have their say and make a fool of me to the top of their bent.

The end of it was that I was persuaded to give up my lodgings and live with them; the very natural consequence being that I fell in love with Catrina, the lovely daughter, and (what was not so natural a consequence) she with me. I never spent such happy days as I did in that quiet, peaceful new home of mine. The widow loved me as a son; Peter was a brother who could never find anything sufficient to show his friendship for me; and Catrina—ah! that was the sweetest of all! Catrina not only loved, but ere long accepted me as her affianced husband.

Alas! it was destined by Providence that my happiness was not to last, and as I pondered over it afterwards, I thought it was too perfect and too sweet to be permanent.

The blow fell upon me about three weeks after the accident happened—in fact, I received two blows together.

One was a letter from my sister to say my mother was dangerously ill, and that, if I wanted to see her alive, I must return at once to England. The other was from my employers, saying that, as the firm had experienced severe losses in the Colonies, my services would no longer be required. Phew! What was to be done? I showed Catrina both letters, and asked her advice.

Digitized by Google

"Go home directly," she said.

"Will you come with me, Catrina?"

"No," she replied; "I cannot leave my mother."

I had two most miserable days talking and arranging about my departure. Peter had obtained a berth for me, and it was agreed that on my return I should marry Catrina, and settle down in Russia for life.

The next day I was en route for England.

I found my mother very ill with rheumatic fever, but not in danger. Of course it was not very long before both she and my sister knew of my attachment to Catrina, and, although they didn't like the idea of my marrying a foreigner, yet, when I interpreted her sweet letters to them, they had to admit that she seemed most ardently attached to me.

My mother got rapidly better, and in August was recommended to go to Homburg, and take the mineral baths and drink the waters, and she insisted on my accompanying her. We arrived after a hot and dusty two days' journey. I secured excellent rooms in a charming little villa on the Unter Promenade.

I enjoyed myself very much at Homburg. I met a great number of Russians whom I had known in their own country, and it was a great treat to me to speak the language again; it reminded me so much of Catrina and my Russian home.

There was one gentleman I took a great fancy to—a man called Scholvolski, a commercial traveller like myself. He seemed to have taken an equal fancy to me, and was always asking me to dine with him at the restaurant. Sometimes a friend of his dined with us, a man I disliked—why I knew not, unless it was that his expression was diabolical, sensual, cruel, and pitiless. I told my friend Scholvolski one day that I wouldn't join him again if he asked his friend. To which he replied, laughingly, "Oh, he's not a bad fellow, only his face is so much against him."

If I had been in Russia I should not have acted as incautiously as I did. In the first place, I should not have encouraged the intimacy of Scholvolski, and in the second I should not have opened my lips and spoken so freely of Russia before his friend—I should have set him down at once for a deadly spy.

But here in Europe I could afford to laugh at all such ideas, and put the thought of spies, midnight arrests, the knout, and all such barbarities out of my head, and give my opinion as loud and as long as I chose about Russia and her customs. This I did very frequently—more especially as I was constantly led on to do so by my friend Scholvolski.

I had been about a month at Homburg, my mother was wonderfully improved, and very anxious to get back home, when a most curious circumstance happened to me. I had not received a letter from Catrina for more than three weeks, and was getting uneasy. I was quite willing to return home, being impatient to ascertain if any letters had arrived from Russia, and had been forwarded and lost. I wrote a long, loving letter to Catrina, telling her I had missed her usual weekly despatch, informing her also of my mother's convalescence and of my impatient desire to get back to Russia and make her my wife with as little delay as possible.

I showed Catrina both letters.

We settled to leave Homburg the following day, and I went to post my letter and bid adieu to my friends. Coming out of the post-office, on the bottom step I saw something glittering in the sun. I picked it up—it was the prettiest little ornament I ever saw. A scarf pin, evidently made to fasten like a brooch, about the size of a shilling; and round it some cabalistic figures inclosed within a garter; two letters interwoven in the centre on red and blue enamel—the letters being in brilliants; a blue enamel 7 at the top, and the letter K hanging from the bottom in plain gold.

I thought the best way to find its owner was to wear it myself; so I stuck it in the left lappel of my coat, and on my black coat it glistened famously. I looked next morning among the list of things lost, in the glass case in the vestibule of the Kursaal; but no notice was up yet. "Well," I thought, "I'll give it till to-morrow, and then I'll hand it to the Commissaire of Police."

In looking for Scholvolski I met his obnoxious friend, who glared in a frightful way at the jewel in my coat, which made me say, in fun, "How do you like the order I have received?"

"Did you receive that?" he asked, apparently unable to keep his eyes off it.

"Why shouldn't I?" I answered, laughing.

He turned on his heel and left me suddenly.

At last, seated at the roulette-table, I found Scholvolski. I touched him on the shoulder, and asked, "What luck?"

"Ah, my dear friend!" he answered, "the same—always bad. How are you? But what—what—" and he too stared with all his might at my order, and seemed to turn pale.

"Well," I thought, "this must be something remarkably interesting. Do they take me for a king in disguise; or do they think I've stolen the decoration? At any rate, I won't tell them until I find out what they mean."

"Come away quickly," said Scholvolski, taking my arm and leading me on to the terrace, where we sat down at a table and had some coffee. All this time he never took his eyes off my decoration.

At last I said, "Well, my friend, how do you like my new order, eh? I flatter myself this is rather better than your dirty little bit of green and orange ribbon."

"Have you had it long?" he asked, seriously.

"No," I replied, "not very long. Why?"

"Oh, nothing; only I thought——. Oh, come and dine with me——quite alone, I assure you; this is our last night."

In vain I pleaded packing.

"Bah!" said he; "you have a good hour before dinner."

It was of no use; he would take no excuse; and when I said, "All right," a curious look came over his face. I didn't understand it then—I did some hours after.

We had a most sumptuous dinner—by far the best he had ever given me. He drank very deeply, and I am ashamed to say I did the same—a thing I am not given to at all; but whether it was the hot night, the hot room, or the excellence of the wine (it was best Johannisberg, two Napoleons the bottle), I know not; all I remember is, we rose late, having had great arguments about Russian politics, secret societies, and other things connected with his country; and I felt anything but firm on my legs.

"I'll see you home, old fellow," he said, taking my arm and leading me out. "Allons for home, sweet home! You've got your order all right, haven't you?" he shouted in my ear; and glaring down on it, his face, to my distempered vision, appeared to have turned yellow.

"Oh, yes, I've got it safe enough," I laughingly answered. "I'm not going to lose such a treasure as that."

"No, mind you don't," he shouted again, and looked yellower than ever.

By this time we had passed through the vestibule, and he hailed a carriage off the stand.

"Get in," he said, quite roughly.

Digitized by Google

"No, thanks," I replied. "I prefer the fresh air, and will walk home; so good-night and good-bye."

"Oh, do just drive with me as far as my lodgings; and we'll walk back to your house together," he pleaded, in his old, kind, gentle way; and, as it was our last night together, I thought I'd humour him, so I got into the cab. He gave some directions in a low tone to the cabman, and off we drove in the opposite direction to my home.

Two or three times I asked my companion where on earth we were going to; but he sat silent, puffing a cigar, and looking very serious; and seeing we were in the country, I could stand it no longer, so I leant out of the cab and asked the coachman where he was driving. I did not catch his reply, for at this moment we pulled up at a solitary, and apparently uninhabited house.

"Here we are. Jump out," said Scholvolski.

The cab drove off rapidly towards Homburg.

"What house is this?" I inquired.

"My lodging," he replied, at the same time giving a peculiar whistle I had heard that afternoon in the gardens.

As he finished speaking, a small panel in the upper portion of the door opened; whereupon Scholvolski said two or three words which I did not catch, and the noise of unlocking and unbarring the door immediatey followed.

"Enter," said my friend.

I had half a mind to turn sharp round, and make a bolt for Homburg. How I wished I had done so before many minutes had elapsed! Scholvolski, following close behind me, gave me a push away from the door, near to which I was lingering, and at the same time it shut with a tremendous bang. The doorkeeper, who I now saw by his lamp was a gigantic ugly Russian, barred it carefully, and then turning round, thrust his lamp full in my face, and pointing to my order, said, with a hoarse laugh:

"Welcome!"

"Come on!" shouted Scholvolski from the end of the dark passage. "Bring the light and show us in."

"All right," answered James; and he followed till we came to where Scholvolski was waiting. Then, throwing open a door, he said something in a low voice, at the same time my friend gave me another awful push that sent me flying into the room; so that, to save myself from falling, I clutched at the back of a chair, and so steadied myself and recovered my senses.

I was in a large, long room, brilliantly lighted, with a table running nearly the whole length, round which were seated about thirty men, all smoking cigarettes. A man who was sitting at the head of the table got up, and said, "Gentlemen, welcome."

To my horror, this man, who seemed the president of the party, was Scholvolski's friend, the one whom I so much disliked.

Just then Scholvolski touched me on the arm, and asked: "How do you like their orders?"

I glanced in the direction he indicated, and saw that every man had on his breast a facsimile of the jewel I wore.

During this time I had been standing in the centre of the room, with Scholvolski near me.

He now said: "Won't you take a seat, and join in the conversation?"

"No, thank you," I replied, feigning coolness. "As it is so late I must be off. But tell me, before I go, who are these gentlemen, and what is the meaning of the order they each wear?"

"You'll soon know," he answered; and, advancing to the table, said, in a loud voice: "Mr. President and gentlemen, this man has asked me to explain who you are, and the meaning of the order (although he himself wears one) on your breasts. What answer shall I give him?"

Whereupon the President rose and said, "Gentlemen, what do you say to trying the traitor now?"

The men round the table silently nodded their heads.

"Good," rejoined the President. "Let the trial begin."

"What does this mean?" I asked of my friend. "Are they rehearsing a scene from a play? At all events, I'm sorry I can't stay to see the fun. So, if you won't come, I must find my way home alone. So good night. Gentlemen I have the honour to wish you a very good evening."

I wrote a long letter to Catrina.

With a polite bow I turned to the door, and tried to open it; but there was no handle, and I pushed in vain.

Scholvolski came up to me. "You can't leave yet; these gentlemen have a few questions to ask you; so come and sit down quietly, and answer them, or——"

"Or what?" I asked, indignantly. "Is this some trap you have led me into? You had better take care. Remember, you are not in Russia."

"Not much difference, though, in this room."

"That we shall see," I said; and, rushing to the door, began hammering at it and shouting at the top of my voice. The whole party smiled at my efforts, which made me more furious; and I redoubled my knocking and calls for help. All at once it opened with a burst that nearly knocked me backwards, and the huge doorkeeper entered. I rushed at the closing door; but he was too quick for me. It was shut again in an instant; and he stood with his back against it.

"Put him in the chair," said the President to this big brute.

"All right, mister," was his reply, and, walking to a cupboard, he brought out a sort of arm-chair with straps and ropes, which he placed in the centre of the room, and then beckoned me to sit in it.

"No!" I exclaimed, "I'm not going to be put tamely in that chair," and I caught up the one I had been leaning against, determined to hold my own. "What is it you want of me? Is it to rob me? Because, if so, I will quietly give you everything I have; but if you think you are going to play any tricks, you are very much mistaken; for the first man who approaches me I'll brain!"

I had hardly concluded when the big porter threw himself heavily upon me, and, with the assistance of two or three more, I was placed in the chair and bound down so securely as to be unable to move hand or foot. My tongue was free, though, and most foolishly, I commenced cries for help. In a couple of seconds I was gagged, and then I was indeed helpless.

"Now," said the President, "Let us get on quickly. Come, Scholvolski, your evidence."

And, to my astonishment, this man, whom I had thought my friend, took out a small pocket-book, and from it read all the conversations we had had together, the opinions I had expressed to him on secret societies in particular, winding up by telling them how I had displayed to him my new order.

As he sat down, seemingly perfectly satisfied with what he had done, I was well aware that I was trapped in the den of a Russian secret society, which bore me some terrible grudge—either for having spoken so openly and scoffingly of it, or for wearing the wretched order I had found.

One after another of the men seated at the table, and to whom I had at times spoken, got up, and repeated all that I had said to them, and generally a good deal more.

When all had had their say, the President rose, and said: "Gentlemen and brothers, this traitor has to be tried by you on the following charges: first, for having (knowing us all to belong to this society) taken every opportunity of maligning and ridiculing it; secondly, for having, by some means unknown to us as yet—but which we will presently get from him—worn our secret order publicly and ostentatiously, and probably explained to everybody he knows its mysterious meaning.

Digitized by Google

"You have heard the evidence, gentlemen. How say you, guilty, or not guilty?"

Without a word being spoken, every man held up his hand.

"Guilty on both charges," added the President. "And now your sentence."

Again they all raised their hands.

"Death!" said the President. "Gentlemen and brothers, in your verdict and sentence I fully concur."

I had nearly fainted as he uttered these last words, and I think I should have done so, but that the porter undid the gag; and the President, rising, addressed me thus: "Prisoner and traitor, you have heard the charges, evidence, verdict, and sentence; have you anything to say why it should not be carried out?"

I nerved myself, and, as boldly as I could, spoke the following words: "Russians, most of you—particularly one (and I looked hard at Scholvolski, who dropped his eyes)—have professed friendship for me; and yet now you want to kill me. Why is this? What have I done? You say I have talked about your secret societies; well, so does every other man you meet; and in Europe everybody says what he thinks. You assert that I have worn your order, knowing it to be the order of your society. This I emphatically deny; as I only picked it up in the streets a few minutes before I met that man" (pointing to the president, for, oddly enough, I had never heard his name).

As I uttered the words "picked it up" there was a smile of derision—they evidently did not believe me. How was I to prove my words? No one had been near me when I found it.

"Is that all you have to say?" asked the President, "because that goes for nothing."

"Let me warn you," I hotly answered. "You are not in Russia, where you can get rid quietly of any obnoxious person, but in Europe; and you'll find yourselves with ropes round your necks if you dare lay violent hands on me."

"Ho! ho!" laughed the brutal President.

"One minute, Frushinkoff," said Scholvolski.

"Hush! hush! How could you be so imprudent? before that man, too!"

"Pardon me; it slipped out," rejoined Scholvolski; "but I don't think he will ever repeat it."

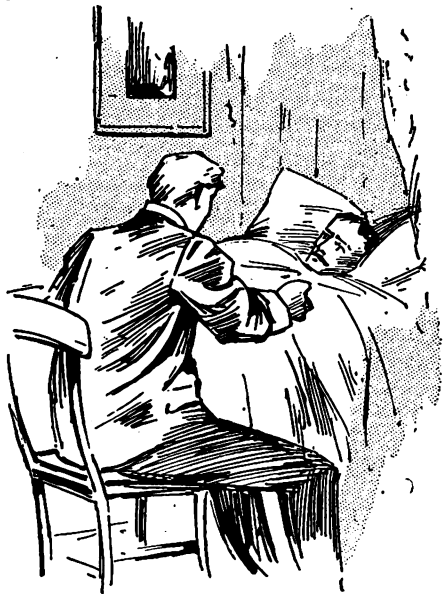
While this bye-talk had been going on between them, I had been racking my brain to try and remember where I had heard the name of Frushinkoff, when all at once I recollected that he was the man who had been at the head of a conspiracy to assassinate the Tsar, and was known to be the most cruel, unscrupulous man in the world. Now I no longer wondered why I had so instinctively mistrusted him, and it was in his merciless hands my life was placed.

"One minute," resumed Scholvolski, having, apparently, appeased the President; "I suppose, as usual, we keep a memento?"

"Certainly," replied the President, and nodded to the porter, who went to the cupboard, and produced a long flat box, which he placed on the table.

"How many will his make?" asked Scholvolski.

"Let's see," said the President, and, with a small gold key attached to his watch-chain, he unlocked the box. How he glared at the contents! "His will be the ninth!" said the President.



He showed me the unlucky ornament.

"Pass it round," asked Scholvolski, who was close to me; and when it was put down in front of him, my curiosity tempted me to look within it too. Heavens! what did I see? A row of human thumbs!

I shut my eyes at the horrid sight, and felt my blood run cold on hearing Scholvolski say, with a laugh, "Karl, you will have to enlarge this space; our friend's thumb here" (and he touched my thumb, which lay outstretched, my arm being bound to the arm of the chair), "is very large."

"The night is half over," said the President, "and we've lots to do before dawn; so come, Karl, the hatchet; and, Scholvolski, you write the card to attach to it, as a memoir of to-night's good work."

Good gracious! my thumb too large for the space! the hatchet! What does it all mean? I knew I had to die, but not to be tortured to death; not to have my limbs hacked off before my eyes. The thought was too fearful.

Although I was nearly unconscious, half dead with fright, I have a misty recollection of seeing the huge porter come up to me with a short hatchet in his hand, and unbind my forearm, laying it in a sort of iron groove which he fitted on the arm of the chair; then, binding it down again on this, and separating my thumb from the other fingers, by covering them with a sheet of lead, which fitted down tightly to the chair. Then he raised the hatchet.

. . . . . .

"Where am I? Who are these people standing round my bed?"

"Well, old fellow, how do you feel, eh?"

"Peter! no, it can't be!"

"He's just awake, mamma."

"Surely that's my sister Julia's voice!"

"Oh, I'm so glad, the dear boy!"

"And that's my mother's!"

In moving, such a pain shot through my right arm that I shrieked. Ah! now I remember. It was no dream, then, after all, but a stern reality. My thumb! Yes, it was missing; and my hand and arm were bound up. But why didn't they kill me? I must get them to tell me. But how came Peter here? Oh, how feeble my voice was.

"Hush!" they all said; "to-morrow."

To-morrow came, and still they said to-morrow; and so, many morrows came and went. At last, after about seven to-morrows, they all assembled round my bed, and kissed me, and asked me how I felt.

"May I talk now?" I asked, eagerly.

"Yes," they answered, "for you are saved."

"Saved!" I exclaimed; "has it been so bad as that?"

They silently nodded their heads, looking very serious.

"For pity's sake, don't do that!" I exclaimed, for it reminded me of that night, and of those silent men.

"Now, Peter, sit down by his bedside, and tell him quietly how you saved his life," said my mother.

"You saved my life, Peter?"

"Yes, my dear friend; even as you once saved mine. I have never forgotten it, and at last I found an opportunity of returning the compliment. You know, of course, that nearly every Russian belongs to some secret society—I among others. We have our signs, signals, and private orders, which, of course, we only wear entre nous. Now for my share in this wretched business.

"Some weeks ago my firm ordered me to England. My sister was always pining to be there, and my mother was wretched at the thought of separation from me, who had never been away from her before. So we agreed to go to your country, and take you by surprise; and that is the reason you have not heard from us for some time."

"Is Catrina here, then?" I demanded, excitedly.

"Hush! yes; the doctor wouldn't let you see her before.

Digitized by Google

This afternoon, if you are quiet, you may. But, to resume, I went to your house in the country, and found you were in Homburg; and as I had still a week or two before I began work, I thought I would bring my mother and Catrina over here with me. Ah, dear me! how unlucky it was I came!"

She came!

"Why?"

"If I hadn't come, you would never have picked up that order. If you hadn't picked up that order, you would not have gone through that dreadful night. And if you hadn't picked up that order, you would have a thumb on your right hand now."

"But how did your coming do all this?"

"Because," he answered, slowly, "that order you picked up I dropped."

"You?"

"Yes. See, here it is," and unbuttoning his waistcoat, he showed me the unlucky ornament.

"Put it away, for heaven's sake," I cried, "it makes my arm ache so!"

"Pardon me, my friend, but I want you to know everything. Now to conclude, and tell you how I came to be lucky enough to save you.

"On the afternoon we arrived I went off to the post-office to ask for letters. It was there I must have lost this. After dinner I started to ascertain if you were still at the Kursaal. Thinking I might meet some of my secret friends, I looked to see if the order was safe, and found, to my dismay, it was gone. As I walked up to the Kursaal, I carefully looked all over the ground. I saw it nowhere.

"At the post-office I looked carefully, especially on the steps, when an official asked me what I had dropped. I told him a small jewel; he then said he had seen an English gentleman pick it up, and fasten it in his coat. Then I was frightened, for if any of my society were to see it in his coat, it would cost him his life, I knew; so I tore all round the Kursaal, which was shutting up, but could find no trace of anyone with the order, nor of you.

"I wandered about long after the rooms were closed, and, at last, was going home very disconsolately, when I met a man hurrying along in the opposite direction, and in whom I recognised a Russian friend, a member of my society. We chatted for some minutes, when, looking at his watch, he told me he must hurry, or he should miss the fun.

"'What fun?' I asked.

"'Oh, some Englishman, or half Russian, half English, has got hold of some of our private signals, knows all about our society, and this very afternoon has been publicly wearing our order; how he got it no one can say; he has been gulled into attending the meeting, and is to be tried to-night. I'm off to see what Frushinkoff and Scholvolski intend to do with him.'

"Off we both started, called a carriage, and arrived shortly after at the awful house. The doorkeeper wouldn't admit me at first, because I couldn't show my order; but, luckily, my friend was a very important member of the society, and became guarantee for me.

"We entered the room, and were recognised directly, and every one began to tell us what the culprit had done.

"'But the fool has fainted, and we want him to come to, that we may finish him,' said Frushinkoff to me.

"'Let me see him,' I said; 'I know a little about medicine, and perhaps can succeed.'

"They made way for me, and I stood beside the fainting man. Oh, my friend, what an awful shock! for it was you, my dear, good brother. It was you who had picked up the order I dropped, and had suffered such agony for my carelessness.

"I immediately protested against their treatment. I told them it was my order which I had lost; and I referred them to the witness I had met with in the official.

"Well, after immense trouble, and on my going security for you with my life, they eventually allowed me to take you away.

"There, that's all; and now you must get well again as quickly as possible."

"How lucky you came in time," was all I could murmur.

Just then my mother and sister came in, and seeing my wistful glance at the door, Julia smiled and called for Catrina.

She came, and how I doted on her.

My story is done. We all returned to England the moment I was well enough. Peter took a small house for his mother and Catrina, close to ours, and we were very happy. In a month or two I married Catrina, and Peter, Julia.

Digitized by Google

A GOOD SAMARITAN

A STORY OF INDIAN WARFARE.

IT was so hot that the blue-gum leaves fairly sizzled. So hot, that, as Pete Oberlin looked across the road from his shanty, the outlines of the Oasis Saloon, and those of the combined post-office and grocery, seemed to waver and dance in the furnace current rising to the glaring, brazen sky. Hot as it was out of doors, it was still more like an oven in Pete's little one-room hut, for the fire was blazing, and Pete, coatless and vestless, was looking after a frying-pan of bacon and a mess of boiling potatoes.

The appetising odour floated out of the doorway and spread over the neighbourhood. It was distinctly noticeable as far off as the row of lopped eucalypti beyond the saloon. At the foot of one of these trees lay what at first sight seemed only a bundle of rags; but a closer inspection revealed a shock of black hair and glimpses of a brown parchment skin that indicated a human being.

Gradually, as the welcome aroma reached the creature's befogged brain, the heap of rags stirred and tossed, and finally, uplifting bodily, resolved itself into a very dirty and torn blanket, surmounted by a hideous, blear-eyed countenance. The old hag—for it was a woman—sniffed at the wandering fragrance, trying to catch its direction, and then staggered unsteadily across the road to Pete's cabin.

"Helloe, there, Wawaga! Gettin' over yer spree?" greeted that gentleman easily.

"Umph! No drunk! Injun hungry!" remarked the visitor.

Pete, laughing good-naturedly, replied: "You wait; I'll give you a bite pretty quick now."

The old woman squatted on her heels by the stove and greedily eyed the preparations for the feast, while Pete kept his own eyes steadily on his cooking to forestall any possible burning. The squaw's restless gaze roved round the room, finally pausing at the shelf behind the stove, upon which stood a cheap alarm-clock and a big black bottle; whereupon she announced, in her quavering croak:

"Ol' Injun heap thirsty."

Pete laughed again. "Go along out ter ther pump, then," he said.

But Wawaga's eye was still glued to the interesting object before her. Soon Pete himself went out to the pump, bucket in hand; immediately the bundle of rags by the wall stretched up a lean arm, with the quick and stealthy motion of a pouncing cat, and, seizing the bottle, poured the fiery contents down through the brown, parchment throat.

Such an unearthly howling and yelling followed this successful thievery, that Pete dropped his bucket and came running in, to find his guest doubled up in agony and rolling on the floor screeching like mad.

"What in thunder's struck her?" he cried; but just then catching sight of the black bottle still clutched in the Indian's skinny claw, his blank look turned to a wide grin. He dropped on the nearest box, slapping his thigh and chuckling: "My eye! ef the old fool ain't drunk that ther quart o' lamp oil!" The terror-stricken screaming redoubled, while the man watched the poor wretch's antics in ecstasy. "It'll teach her to quit meddlin'," he muttered gleefully; but as the moments passed he began to realise that the matter was serious, for the creature's contortions grew awful, and her anguish too great for amusement.

Pete's grin faded insensibly; he scratched his head thoughtfully, grumbling: "Don't know as I want the old gal kickin' the bucket here and now, but what in creation's a feller goin' ter do fer her? Oh, gosh! I know!" He bolted across the road, sending up a choking cloud of powdery soil, and burst into the store.

"I say, Ike, yer got any mustard?" he demanded. "Old Wawaga's drunk all my lamp oil, an' it's goin' to kill her! Don't yer hear that screechin'?"

Ike Dempsey, roused from his mid-day nap, rubbed his eyes and stretched himself, then rising deliberately from the barrel on which he was sitting and thrusting his quid into one cheek, drawled lazily: "Wal, now, where's the hurt ef the ol' sot do gin us the shake? Oh, doan't be in er rush naow! I guess ther's a can er mustard raound somewhere."

Reaching a long, lazy arm under the counter, he clattered among his possessions and brought up a fistful of yellow-brown dust. "This here nuff? Never mind payin'!" In two minutes more Pete Oberlin laid violent hands on the rolling heap of agony in his cabin, and sternly commanded, "Drink this." She drank it. Then the frontierman dragged her bodily outside the shanty, and left her alone with her misery.

After some time Pete returned to his patient, bearing a tin plate with a generous share of his dinner. He presented this with a flourish, and grinned sympathetically as the morsels of food disappeared.

When the shadows of the blue-gums stretched long and gaunt to the eastward, and a mellow pink flushed the tops of the grand, distant mountains, a tipsy and squalid old squaw, in tattered blanket, trailed slowly up the dusty road through the foothills; and for six months neither Ike Dempsey, nor Pete, nor even Pat Grogan at the saloon, saw any more of Wawaga.

When Pete Oberlin reached up to the shelf behind the stove that night, and, after feeling vainly in the darkness, struck a match and examined the surface, he let forth a volley of imprecations, finishing up with: "Wisht I'd let the old thief die and be hanged to her, afore ever she got away with my hand-carved briar-wood pipe."

. . . . . .

Week after week Pete Oberlin, in his capacity of mail-carrier, jogged over the dusty plain, wound in and out through the foothills, with a stop here and there at the ranches, and climbed over the ridge to the fort on the reservation, always the destination of the biggest part of his budget.

After the early rains had carpeted the bare brown hills with green and given a glossier tinge to the mournful bark-stripped eucalyptus, he began to hear ugly rumours on his trips from farmhouse to farmhouse. There had not been an Indian outbreak for twenty years in that section, but some disquieting influence was hard at work on the red-skins. Some said the Indian Messiah was coming, others that one of Geronimo's lieutenants had been sowing this excitement among them; be that as it may, there was watchful anxiety at the fort, and a growing feeling of danger in the breasts of the neighbouring ranchmen.

Every bit of this came, of course, to the ears of the mail-carrier, and, in the snug bar-room of the "Oasis," he would regale a little knot of cronies with highly coloured tales of the secret dances, the weapons, and war preparations to be seen in wild nooks in the hills, if a white man knew where to look for them. Yet for all these notes of warning no one dreamt of an actual dangerous uprising.

One soft winter's night, when the damp-laden rain wind blew heavily from the south, and the low-hung cloud blanket shut out every wee ray of starlight, dark-mounted figures met in a sheltered hill basin. Ten, twenty, fifty, they gathered; then in single file, with muffled hoofs, they wound away from their prison. Several hours later, as the mischievous band stealthily made its way out on the plain, a stunted figure, in a ragged blanket, shrunk silently into the bushes to let the cavalcade pass, and then emerged once more from her cover and struck into a swinging trot in the rear of the swift-moving riders.

Digitized by Google

A faint, angry flush of dawn peeped over the sombre mountains as the redskins surrounded the few scattered buildings composing Rush Station. A dog barked in the rear of the saloon, and in response, a sharp report sent a shudder through the chill morning air; with a howl of anguish, the poor beast rolled over in the dust. At the crack of the pistol, the half-dozen men in the shanties came tumbling out from different doorways. Not one was more than half-dressed, but each one had snatched up his rifle. What odds are six men against fifty?

As the hastily wakened settlers stumbled out from their cabins, a leaden hail rattled round them; two of their number fell, struck off at once by the raiders. "Injuns!" cried Ike Dempsey, and the four remaining defenders, now very thoroughly aroused, drew quickly back into the store and blazed away from this cover at their murderous assailants. They had ammunition in plenty and spare guns. Ike's wife put her two little sobbing children into a big box in the centre of the building, as the point that was furthest from danger, and herself filled the hot, smoking rifles.

The fusilade was thick and fast, and bullets flew in through the openings. Pat Grogan's right arm was shattered, but he rested his gun on the window and fired away vindictively. Poor Smith was shot through the lungs, and fell in a dying condition; Mrs. Dempsey took his place, handling her rifle deftly. Time and again some sharp howl of anguish told of a well-directed shot at the half-concealed, sinister foemen.

Morning was advancing; perhaps by this time the flight from the reservation was discovered, and soldiers were coming to help them—if only they could keep the red devils at bay a little longer. Vain hope! Black Wing, chief of the raiders, had also thought of the soldiers; he concluded it was time to make short work of these sharp-sighted marksmen who were picking off his companions. There came a sudden, fearful yelling, a swift rush and retreat of moccasined feet, then the pungent smell of smoke, and the ominous crackling of the fire licking up the dry boards. The heat became intolerable—to remain was sure death from the destroying element.

"We must run for it, boys!" cried Pete Oberlin. "The door of my shanty stands open, an' there ain't no Injuns inside it!"

The shot-riddled portal was flung wide, with the two little lads in the middle, the forlorn hope sought a new refuge, their guns speaking death in the passage. Ike Dempsey fell in his own doorway, shot through the brain. Pat Grogan fell in the roadway, and, at the same moment, the brave who had shot him reeled and toppled down from his saddle. With a horrible sense of sickness, Pete saw a savage horseman bury his tomahawk in the woman's head, and then snatch up one of the children and dash his skull on the door-stone. The other little fellow slipped from the hand that grasped at him, and stumbled over the cabin threshold, barely escaping a bullet; a sharp whistle cut the air, Pete felt a stinging pain in his shoulder, and fell to the ground unconscious.

With an exultant shout at the destruction of this last enemy, the savage band swarmed from their place of attack, and hastily entered the buildings, stowing away whatever was easily portable, and making sad havoc in Grogan's stock of liquors; but they were not yet far enough from the reservation to allow themselves a long stop. The store was burning fiercely. To force his unruly followers to hurry, Black Wing fired the saloon with his own hand, the wooden frame blazing like tinder.

One by one the sheds were ignited; three or four wretches, with fresh, gory scalps dangling at their belts, rushed over to apply the torch to the only remaining building—Pete Oberlin's shanty. A young brave stumbled over the inanimate form in the pathway, and with a hoop of delight waved his keen blade over the thick black locks. Just as he stooped to his victim, an odd, long-drawn cry arrested his arm in its motion. A wild and dust-covered figure sprang into the blood-crazed circle, pouring out a torrent of guttural abuse and lamentations that somehow commanded attention.

The old woman—for it was Wawaga—bent over the prostrate man, waving off the armed braves, and felt for the faintest of heart-beats; then raising herself to her full height, shaking back her snaky hair, and with a rude, powerful majesty, she commanded in her own tongue:

"Go, while yet you have time! Before the morning has ended, the soldiers will be on you. This man still lives. He is mine; do not touch him; you have the scalps of the others."

Wawaga was one of the mothers of the tribe, and her words had weight with the warriors. Black Wing mounted his pony, and all his raiders did likewise. In the light of the grey, cloudy morning, a wild procession scurried over the plain and away once more to the mountains, where they could find secret hiding and for months elude their pursuers, while they kept the whole country in terror with their burning and killing.

When Pete Oberlin, lying in his own bunk, opened his eyes on the dim scene lighted by the flickering fire, he thought he had gone through a horrible dream. Kicking off the covers, he sat up with a vigorous jerk; but the sharp pain in his shoulder made him grind his teeth in agony. At the same moment he became aware of a dark figure crouched in one corner holding a bundle of white. His sudden motion and muttered exclamation stirred the quiet watcher; stumbling to her feet, she bore her burden to the pallet and deposited it beside him. "Him live, lil boy," she announced gravely.

Pete sank back beside the sleeping child, with a choking sensation, half-thankfulness for their escape and half-horror at the suddenly conjured picture of the boy's murdered mother and brother. He remembered how he was wounded. How had they two escaped scalping? How came Wawaga there? Were the redskins still at the station? If so, he must use great caution. Perhaps they had kept him for torture. The woman anticipated his queries. "Injuns gone! You go now, 'fore come back!" Pete started again upright, maintaining his position in spite of the shooting and dreadful dizziness.

"Which way shall I go, and how?" he asked eagerly. "I must teke little Jim. Did them raskils git all their hosses?"

"White man keep still! Wawaga get pony!" and the old woman drew the tattered blanket round her and slipped noiselessly from the room, leaving Pete to his own busy thoughts. She was gone but a few seconds before she glided in again, muttering, "Him ready. You go fort, no find Injuns!"

Wawaga herself carried out the boy. "No touch, arm hurt," she said, motioning away the wounded man. Very gently she lifted the tiny figure, stilling the fretful wail and coaxing him to wake up and ride on the pony. She led the way, and Pete followed. As he stepped out into the dusk, his heart swelled at the utter desolation. Only the scorched row of gum-trees marked the site of the Rush Station beside his forlorn little cabin.

With a good deal of wrenching and pain Pete clambered into the saddle; the squaw lifted the boy before him; the man gathered the bridle into his useful hand, encircling the child with the same arm. Before he put spurs to his horse and set out on his perilous journey, he leant down towards the stunted and squalid hag at the horse's head, saying hoarsely: "You're a good'un, Wawaga! I'll do as much fer you if ever I git ther chance."

"Ugh!" grunted the old woman. "Squaw no good; heap good white man, no let ol' Injun die! All even now. Here—ol' squaw take um—no good, b'long white man." She thrust a black something into his hand, and, turning stolidly ound, re-entered the desolate cabin.

Peter Oberlin buried his spurs in his animal's flank, and the beast sprang forward, past the heaps of smouldering cinders and the rows of gum-trees, and headed straight for the mountains. In his unwounded hand, with the bridle, Pete held his long-lost briar-wood pipe.

Digitized by Google

The Outlaws' Treasure.

Illustrated by MR. A. KEMP TEBBY.

—o—

SUMMARY.

The mail train has been robbed between Cornwall and La Grange stations, and £20,000 worth of gold stolen by a gang of desperadoes, headed by two brothers named Mulligan Two passengers on the train—Adolph Squirrek, alias Smith, a detective tracking the Mulligans, and Fred Welden, a young lawyer—who have struck up an acquaintance on the way, alight at Somerville, where the former stopped at the "Drover," and the latter at his mother's house. During the night a message comes to say that Judge Woodland's horse has come back alone, and Weldon, together with Squirrek and two other men set out to find him, and discover one of Mulligan's confederates lying senseless on the road. The man, who had made an unsuccessful attempt on the life of the judge, is sentenced to forty years imprisonment. At Judge Woodland's Weldon meets a Spaniard named Alvarido Almanaz, and the two men become rivals for the love of Florence, the judge's daughter. Weldon is inveigled to a lonely bridge near Cornwall, and disappears. Squirrek pays a fruitless visit to the spot. Squirrek arouses the citizens of Cornwall, who make their way to the outlaws' hiding-place.

CHAPTER XVII.

MR. SMITH FINDS A MYSTERIOUS SLIP OF PAPER.

As stealthily as shadows we advanced, and in a few seconds more were in front of the outlaws' cabin. I was a few feet in advance and observed that the door was a few inches ajar, which led me to believe that there was no one within, or that they were all asleep.

This supposition, however, was quickly renounced at the very moment of reaching my hand forward to push open the door, for I heard distinctly the sound of a footstep, as if someone were walking hastily over the floor in slippers. The door was slammed violently to, and we could hear the fastenings rapidly put in place.

This fired up my men, and with a shout they threw themselves against the door. But it was built with a view of just such emergencies as these, and it did not yield in the least.

At this juncture, my lieutenant, young Belknap, performed a deed which was certainly very daring and startling in its character. While the others were bumping and hammering away at the door, I suddenly saw him going over the roof of the cabin like a monkey; and before anyone suspected his intentions, he threw one foot over the wall of the heavy stone chimney, and the next instant dropped out of sight.

We all held our breath and listened. There was profound silence for a moment, and then a sound of scuffling was heard, and again silence, and then someone working at the door.

When it was opened, Belknap stood before us, exhausted, and behind him lay the fifth of the Mulligan gang, placed hors de combat.

"Were there no more?" I inquired.

"Not that I saw."

"You were brave, but it was too rash."

Up to this time I had a lingering hope that Fred Weldon would be found a prisoner in the building, and I still looked about me with a trembling, eager glance; but one glimpse of the room was sufficient to dissipate all such hope.

There was but a single apartment in the entire building, and it was without garret or cellar. A slight examination proved further that there was no "hidden chamber" or retreat provided for the vast amount of wealth that must certainly be in the possession of this gang.

I knew that there was a general expectation of finding a sort of Captain Kidd's treasure here, and the men began ransacking the cabin all through, and searching outside. There was no flooring at all, and the earth was packed almost as hard as a rock, yet they managed to harrow up every square foot—treating the dead body as a useless log—but their search was without any tangible result.

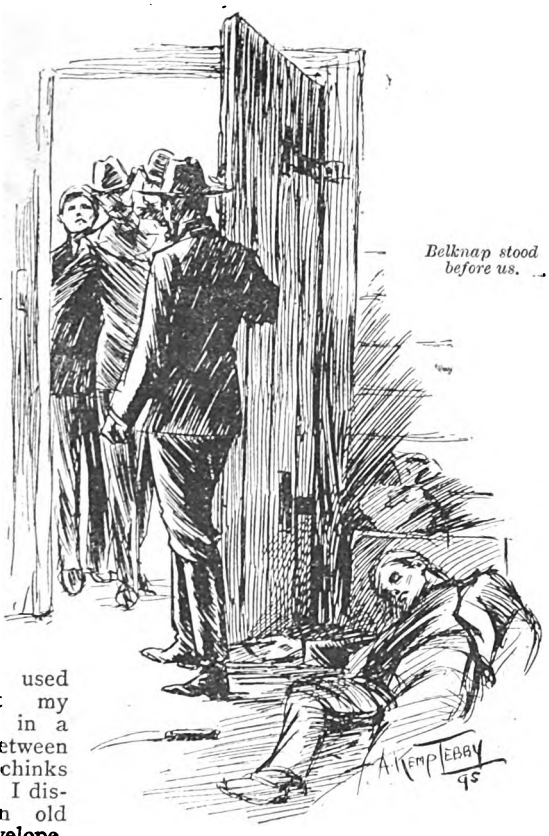
I was glad that nothing was found; not on my account, but for the sake of the men, who would have been demoralised by the sight of gold, and probably would have fallen to wrangling and fighting over it, and unquestionably serious results would have followed.

"They are too cunning to hide their treasure here," I remarked, with a smile, when I saw they were about to despair. "They have taken good care to put it where there is no danger of any of us finding it."

They threw themselves a'nst the door.

Digitized by Google

They were very reluctant to give up the search, but, by this time, they began to feel a sort of shame at their diversion from their first object in coming thither, and they announced themselves ready to leave the island.



Belknap stood before us.

While they were thus occupied I was not idle myself, although I used little but my eyes; but in a crevice between the rough chinks of the logs I discovered an old yellow envelope, without superscription of any kind, but within, written in a fine hand, upon a carefully-folded piece of notepaper, was the following:—

"1——0——1

"Cfujk't Bsdfj 5ozct Mpqug Vmeds sid X gjsf Nbg."

I saw at once that there was something here, but it was in the form of a riddle, which I had no time to study out that time. So I placed it carefully away in my pocket-book, to be examined at my leisure.

As nothing more remained to be accomplished, we set fire to the cabin and pulled off from the island. As the poor wretch of an outlaw was dead beyond all surgical skill, it was no cruelty to him that he was burned according to the Hindoo fashion.

We found our friends impatiently awaiting us on shore, where they were anxious to be led against the remnant of the outlaws. As these numbered only three, and they were not known to be anywhere in the vicinity, we started on our way back to Brampton.

As no clue had yet been obtained to the whereabouts of young Weldon, quite a number were anxious to make a search for him—a proceeding in which I gladly assisted. We ranged up and down Devil's Creek, examining the limpid stream with a minuteness that revealed every frog which had not yet retired to his winter quarters.

I was pleased and not disappointed at their failure to discover anything at all that could throw light upon the disappearance of Weldon; for I had a theory of my own which held out strong hope of unearthing my friend, and had they come upon his inanimate body, of course my whole theory would have exploded.

It was growing dusk when we swarmed up the railway line and signalled the westward bound train, which set us down in the station at Brampton about half an hour later.

Here we learnt that the rising against the Mulligan brothers was not confined to Cornwall alone. Hundreds were scouring the country for a radius of fifty miles round.

A few minutes after our arrival, a telegram was received announcing that Jake Johnson, another of the outlaws, had been caught in a barn a few miles from Somerville, whither he had been chased by a party of men, half of whom were on horseback. Refusing to surrender, the barn had been fired and he burned within it, but not until he had killed two of his pursuers and desperately wounded three others.

This left, as was generally believed, only the two leaders, Dick and Jim, at large, and no one seemed to have any inkling of their whereabouts. They had probably been warned, and were securely concealed somewhere by their friends, and doubtless would soon effect their escape out of a neighbourhood which had suddenly become too hot to hold them.

The excitement in Cornwall subsided as rapidly as it arose. There was a vast deal of conversation regarding the proceedings of the day, but as no one had any additional information to communicate, they soon tired of this, and the usual quiet reigned over the town.

I found myself quite a lion, however, and saw that the only way I could escape being bored to death, was either to leave the place or to don a disguise which could not be penetrated.

In the quiet of the evening, and when alone in my room, I took out my bit of writing, and for two hours intently studied it, seeking some clue to its meaning; but not the slightest success rewarded my perseverance. To me it was as dumb as the Sphinx.

CHAPTER XVIII.

RELATES WHAT HAPPENED ON THE PLATFORM.

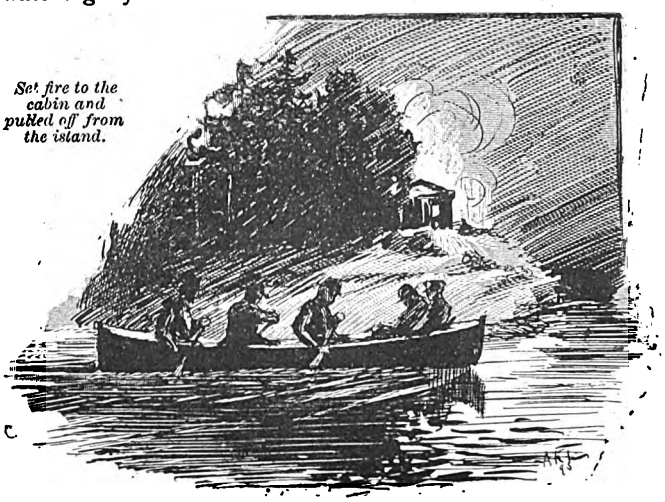
THURSDAY, November ——.—This morning, on my way to the station to take the train to Somerville, I dropped in at the post-office, and received the following note, postmarked Chicago, and addressed to Richard X. Smith, the name I recorded on the hotel register yesterday:

"SIR,—Frederick Weldon, about whose disappearance you are so greatly concerned, is in Chicago, and was seen there to-day, and addressed by me. He says he has reasons for keeping his presence here unknown to his friends at home for some time to come. I tell you this that you may rest easy.—GEORGE JACQUET."

No doubt the individual writing the above note thought he did a very clever thing when he sent it to me, but as it happens to be in the same hand that wrote the warnings to the jury when "poor Tom Borie" was on trial, and that penned the letter that drew Weldon to the bridge over the Devil's Creek, it certainly did not deceive me for an instant.

It proved one thing only to my mind. The search for Weldon had become so close and vigorous that certain parties were becoming uneasy, and the letter was a ruse intended to throw us off the scent.

There was no little comfort afforded me in the reception of this letter, for it pointed more strongly than ever to my young friend still walking the earth, and it gave me a capital opportunity of effectually blinding those who were evidently watching my movements.



Set fire to the cabin and pulled off from the island.

Digitized by Google

When I was about to procure my ticket for Somerville, I went back to the hotel, under the plea that I had forgotten something, and remained in my room for over an hour. Then I told the landlord that I was going towards Chicago, to be gone probably some time. And so I went.

At the station I purchased a ticket for Chicago, and sped on towards that wonderful city, with no intention of going to it for some time to come. I carefully scanned the faces of all the passengers in my car, but I am convinced that there was no one following me, and that I was free from all observation, except that of a general character.

After changing cars several times, and crossing the line into Illinois, I left the train at a small village, which boasted the euphonious name of Cabbagetown. At a little miserable tavern I managed to secure a room, where, during the evening, I made my metamorphosis.

In the morning I appeared in a bushy red wig, with my complexion dyed an olive colour, and in the habiliments of a Western drover, my trousers being tucked in at the top of my boots, while I had a swaggering air which was as good as the genuine. This is simply my disguise in which to get back to Somerville without being recognised. After I reach that place I can make any change necessary, but I think it will throw them or him off the track, or, as Weldon terms it, in his journal, the shadow.

The landlord stared at me like one thunderstruck when I made my appearance, but I explained it by saying that I had called to see my friend Jones, who would shortly be down.

This satisfied him, although what he thought when Jones proved non est is more than I can imagine. Perhaps he imagined that he had been annihilated by me, or spirited away in some mysterious manner.

It was raining when I reached the station in Cabbagetown, and the train was two hours behind time, so I had a dreary spell of it in the rickety station until I could start to Somerville again.

At first I sat down by the fireplace and endeavoured to study out the curious piece of writing, that had been discovered in the outlaws' cabin, but as I never was expert at doing such things, I had not the incentive which a slight prospect of success gives anyone.

We detectives may boast of our success in "working up" cases, yet those who are in the profession know how much depends upon chance or accident. A clue thus obtained often leads to success; but when a man has his wits alone to use, without any extraneous help in the way of accidental

The landlord stared at me like one thunderstruck.

I could hear the murmur of their voices.

discovery, he is baffled and completely defeated more frequently than is generally supposed.

In this little country village of Cabbagetown I never dreamt for a moment that anything would be seen or heard having the slightest bearing upon the disappearance of Frederick Weldon; and yet, while waiting for the train, I made a discovery which gave me more light than anything I had as yet learned.

I was walking moodily along the dark station, smoking my cigar, while a drizzling rain was falling upon me, when I suddenly became aware that there were two other men also on the platform, engaged in doing the same. They, however, kept beyond the feeble light thrown out by the lamp of the stationmaster, and I could just make out their forms as they slowly walked back and forth.

I could hear the murmur of their voices, and it was evident that they were conversing very earnestly about something. At the distance where I stood it was impossible to detect a word, so I began manœuvring to get a nearer position without attracting notice, not with the expectation of learning anything important, but from a habit I have got into of endeavouring to pick up every scrap of information possible, without regard to the time and occasion.

Back and forth I walked, puffing at my cigar, and gradually extending my walk until I managed to encounter the strangers and to get a glimpse of their faces. They ceased talking when I came within earshot, but the momentary glance I obtained disclosed the fact that both of the individuals, although strangers to me, were in disguise.

Whether a detective becomes long-eared in time may well be questioned, but he certainly grows sharp-eared, and by-and-bye I caught a word.

"It's rather risky," said one.

"I don't see as it is. No one will know us."

"But they've woke up in that neighbourhood, and be apt to nab the first feller they catched near the bridge."

"Then he'll be snapped up, if there was danger, but he's very sharp, and I'm afeard he'll be a little too sharp for us."

Here we receded from each other, and it was several minutes before I caught their utterances again. As yet I had no suspicion that their words concerned me at all, but I was startled by what I heard next.

"If we can get there before him he may go to the dogs, and we'll give this neighbourhood a wide berth after this."

"Better wait until the excitement dies out," said the more cautious stranger.

Digitized by Google

"And lose it all," growled the other.

"How do you know that he can find it?"

"Hasn't he got the paper?"

"Of course he has, but he hasn't got the brains to make it out."

"Can't be sure of that; he'll play sharp on us if he gets a chance, and I 'spect he's larned how to read it."

"Then make him try to coax me to show him?"

"All a blind——."

Again the drizzling rain intervened, and shut out the words. The men glanced at me several times, but they were earnest and did not speak in as low tones as they imagined. Anxious as I was to hear the rest of their words, I was compelled, for appearance sake, to saunter away until I was beyond earshot.

Then I lit another cigar and stood at the other end of the station, as if I was listening the coming of the train, which I sincerely hoped would be delayed a half hour longer at the least.

"If you are determined to risk it, you can do so."

"You will go with me?"

"Of course."

"They thinned us out pretty well; they haven't left us Jubal, even, the harmless darkie."

"We're even there, for we've used up more of them. I only wish we had that young dog off our hands."

"He soon will be; he's the game of the Duke."

"Delays are dangerous——"

The faint whistle of the far off train was heard and the men ceased talking.

"Have you your ticket?" suddenly asked one.

"No; let's get them."

I was within when they came in the station and saw them buy two tickets to the Junction, the point where we changed carriages to go to Somerville. As cautiously as I could I stole a glance at their faces, and fixed them in my mind.

They looked at me more than once, but I assumed my most innocent and oblivious expression, and neither had the remotest thought that that simple-looking drover had any suspicion of them.

Far up the road the starlight glimmer of the approaching engine was seen, and through the drizzling shower the shrill shriek of the whistle reached us as the train began to slacken speed.

My acquaintances buttoned their overcoats to their chins, and walked out upon the platform, I, as a matter of course, following close behind them.

They stood in silence a few moments, and then one of them muttered an imprecation against the weather as a blast of wind swept the driving rain into his face.

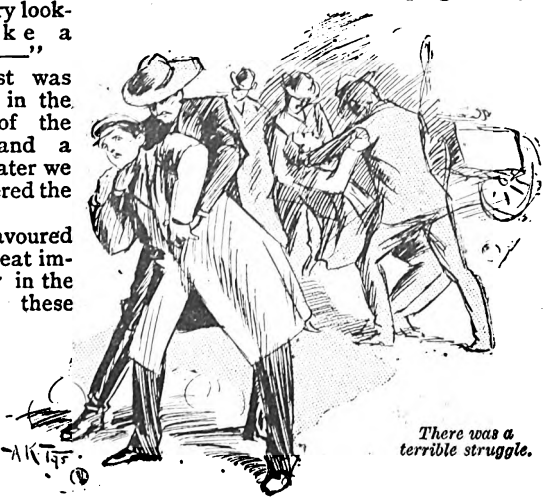
"There's one man I'd like to get even with," said the other.

"The feller that started this hunt?"

"Yes; that infernal detective that's been tramping through the country looking like a minister——"

The rest was drowned in the shrieks of the whistle, and a moment later we three entered the carriage.

I endeavoured to get a seat immediately in the rear of these gentry, but was disappointed, as the place was occupied.



There was a terrible struggle.

At the Junction I was no more fortunate, although I kept in the same carriage, and went with them to Somerville, where they went their road, and I mine.

But I was well convinced by this time that I had made the acquaintance of no less personages than the two veritable Mulligan brothers, who, by some powerful attraction, were drawn towards the very central point of danger to themselves.

But they were in my power, the man who of all others was the least disposed to show them a particle of mercy.

I was able to hear every word they uttered.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE CAPTURE OF THE BROTHERS.

I SAID the Mulligan brothers went their way, and I mine, which was simply because our paths were the same. They preceded me to the Drover's Hotel, which we reached just as night was closing in (for a great many miles intervened between Somerville and Cabbagetown). As I suspected, they were going to lodge in the same house with me. I kept out of sight until they had eaten their supper, and gone to their rooms.

Then I passed into the bar-room, and saw the signature of Richard Phillips and James Wilson, and the room they had taken; after which I went out and made my way to the mayor's office.

After a few preliminaries I finally put the question:

"Any prospect of capturing the Mulligan brothers?"

"Not much; they have been in too many hard scrapes to be caught in this one. And then, they have had time to get out of the neighbourhood."

"Is there any reward out for their apprehension?"

"The man who can enable us to put our hands upon these two brothers will make £2,000."

"Well, sir, if you will give me sufficient force I will capture both of those men, and produce them at this office within an hour!"

The old fellow rose from his seat and stared at me in amazement for a few seconds.

"Are you in earnest?"

"Never more so in my life."

"You shall have your men, then. How many do you want?"

"Four or five."

He summoned the six police officers which constituted the whole force of Somerville. One of these acted as marshal, and we started towards the Drover's Hotel.

On the very eve of success, we came within a hair's breadth of failing. The Mulligan brothers had left the hotel at the time we reached it, and we learnt that they had gone to a livery stable, doubtless intending to make their contemplated visit to the "Bridge" during the night.

Fearful of their escaping us altogether, we broke into a run for the stables, and reached them just as the two men were entering a light cart to drive away.

There was a terrible struggle before they were captured, and once or twice I thought that these two desperate men would overcome more than three times their number who were struggling with them. Pistol shots were freely fired, and when a crowd began collecting, I believe the desperadoes only surrendered through fear of falling into their hands.

They were hurried off to gaol, and on the way thither, the ominous cry of "Lynch them! Lynch them!" was heard, but the officers made all haste through the street with them, and had them hustled and locked into the gaol before the mob had time to organise for a rescue.

During the combat with the police officers, the wigs and disguises had been stripped from the outlaws, so that they were readily recognised by the crowd.

Digitized by Google

The mayor had strong fears of the gaol being attacked, and he placed as large a force as he could organise on guard round it during the night. There were mutterings of a storm, which grew more portentous as the night advanced until I finally made my way towards the official's office to advise him to make a speech to the crowd, or to do something to conciliate them.

As I went in, I encountered a tall man coming out. We met in the dark, so that I could not see his face, although I suspected his identity.

"Who was he?" I inquired as soon as I was sure he was beyond hearing.

"A Spaniard, I presume, from the name he gave—Almanaz."

"You will excuse me," I said; "but it will help the cause of justice if you will tell me what errand he had with you."

"He asked me for a note that would admit him into the gaol to see the Mulligans."

"Did you comply with his request?"

"I did, after considerable importunity on his part. He said they had stolen and concealed a vast amount of plate and jewellery belonging to a friend of his, and he thought he could frighten the secret out of them now that they were in durance."

"Now, give me a note to the gaoler in the form of a peremptory order, whether you are legally empowered to do so or not, that he admits me to the cell adjoining that where these two men are confined."

The mayor looked rather doubtfully at me.

"I must hear what passes between these parties. It is all-important—and excuse me if I remind you that there is little time for delay."

Without a word he took up his pen and wrote a few lines, and then handed them to me. "Will that do?"

"The thing exactly; thank you, sir. Now put on your hat and come to the gaol with me. There are signs about that building that look bad, and that must receive attention."

"I understand you, sir," he replied, as he put on his hat; "whether a speech from me will produce any good effect or not remains to be seen."

"Let us make haste," said I, beginning to feel a little nervous.

We walked rapidly, and ten minutes later were pushing our way through the surging crowd round the gaol.

We found the gaoler excited, frightened, and angry. Although the mayor was with me, yet he refused to admit me.

"Wait until to-morrow, or till this crowd disperses."

"But you have just allowed a visitor to go in."

"Yes."

"Why did you do that?"

"Because I was so frightened I didn't know what I was doing."

"It was not that alone," remarked the mayor with a significant smile. "Mr. Jenkins here must go in; his request must be complied with. Do you act as his conductor, therefore, while I go out and do my best towards dispersing this crowd, which seems to be getting clamorous."

The gaoler sullenly complied, and as I passed in, I heard the mayor's voice rising above the din of the multitude. "Fellow citizens——," and then the hasty closing of the door shut out the rest of his speech.

My cicerone walked rapidly to a certain cell, hastily unlocked it, and then slammed it to behind me with such violence that, for a moment, I was sure he had fastened me in. In fact he was so sullen and out of humour that I did not exchange a word with him.

In a few minutes he withdrew.

Despite the clamour and racket on the outside, a tomb-like silence prevailed within. The cells were separated by thick walls, which made it impossible for me to catch what was said distinctly; but by shoving my door partly open, I was enabled to hear every word uttered.

The preliminaries had evidently been concluded, and the three men were talking "business."

"Who got us in this scrape?" demanded one of the Mulligans in a sullen, gruff voice, which seemed to insinuate an accusation against the Spaniard himself.

"It was the work of that vile detective," replied the Cuban.

"How did he know us?"

"He followed you to Cabbagetown, heard you talking together, and rode all the way back to Somerville with you in the train, as far as I can make out."

The language which followed this piece of information cannot be imagined nor described; and it was fearful to hear the imprecations which they called down upon the head of the innocent-looking drover, that they had scarcely deemed worth a moment's notice.

At the same time it was a source of wonder to me how the señor had become acquainted with this little exploit of mine, which I imagined to be a secret from every one. It was probably a sharp conjecture of his, from seeing me go into the mayor's office, and observing the part I took in the arrest.

"Is there any likelihood of their getting in?" was the next question, which, doubtless, referred to the mob outside.

"Shouldn't wonder a bit," replied Almanaz. "I tell you it looks pretty dark. Now, Jim, you promised me long ago to tell me the meaning of this writing; and what is the sense of waiting any longer?"

"I'll see you hanged first," was the moody reply.

"That would be a smart trick," added the other, "to let you walk out there, get it all, walk away with it, and then leave us without a cent."

"But what chance have you of getting out, any way?"

"We'll soon show them."

"But I'll swear that I won't take more than my third. You know I am entitled to that much."

"And you'll get it, too, when we get out of this fix, and not before."

Still the Cuban refused to be denied. He certainly had a great prize at stake, or he would not have held on in this manner.

"Car-a-ah!" he exclaimed with that low, rattling guttural so expressive of intense anger. "You're fast, you're gagged, and what good will it do you to carry the secret to the grave with you?"

"We haven't got to the grave yet," was the boastful retort of one of the Mulligans. "We're some way off yet."

"You may be nearer than you think."

"So may you; but why do you come to us? You've got it there on paper—why don't you read it yourself?"

"I can't make it out."

The outlaws laughed, and the señor renewed his entreaties, but they were in vain, and in a few minutes he withdrew, with muttered threats of being revenged upon them.

I waited until I was certain he was beyond sight, and then I followed. Outside I was surprised and pleased to find that not a soul was visible. The crowd were all gone, doubtless dispersed by the eloquence of the mayor. The hour was late, and I went straight to the hotel and retired.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

THE BURGLAR'S PAIN-PETTOATS

—o—

My friend, the burglar, when I asked him to drink, called the buxom young lady behind the bar Flossie, dorling, and asked her to give him some gin hot—unsweetened.

"Don't drown it," he said, when she was putting the water in—"don't drown it. Give it a chawnce. It cawn't swim, you know." He leant across the counter and spoke more lovingly to the magnificent young person. "I sy; I sy, where're you a-going to next Sunday, Ader? Eh? Give us one of them violets you've got."

The magnificent lady frowned at him with such loftiness that I expected him to die on the spot. But he didn't. He only hummed a tune intended, I think, to have a topical reference.

The lady at the bar panted and said breathlessly (and with no stops) "What next," she wondered, "horrid fellow, little less noise, if you please, you're not in a low music hall now." He responded to this with some feeling that he wished he was.

He drank to a toast of ten thousand a year for all of us, and sat down near me. Then he took off his soft cap, and silently dusted a few crumbs off the marble table, and put it on again.

"The best-looking business I was ever mixed up in," he said slowly, "was down at Heron Court, near Guildford. I may be a bit old-fashioned in my tastes, but I've always been rather partial to duchesses." (He said this with a relish, as though they were something sold in tins.) "And when I saw in Lloyd's that the young duke had gone and married Miss Deborah Clancy, daughter of the well-known rubber merchant, of New Haven, Connecticut; and when I saw that the wedding presents was both numerous and costly, and the happy pair had left town for the duke's house near Guildford, amid a shower of rice and old slippers, then I said to myself, I said, 'Go in and win, my boy, and play the game off of your own bat. Don't have no partners,' I says to myself. 'Don't have no confederates, but just go in and have a good old try.' So I dressed myself up very tastefully, and I went down to Milford Station.

"I had a Gladstone bag with me, and in that bag I had a few necessary articles that no one can do without.

"I was walking out one afternoon, and I was going down a lane pretty close to the grounds of the mansion. In front of me was a neat girl in blue serge, with a bonnet-box in her hand. She was one of the slim-waisted sort, and she carried herself very upright. As I passed her I caught sight of the address. It was for the Duchess. I lifts my hat like this—look!

"'Pardon me, miss,' says I, 'but might you be one of the maids at Heron Court?'

"'Well,' she says, 'I might.'

"'Oh!' I says. 'Pleasant weather we're having, aren't we!'

"She said yes it was very pleasant weather indeed. She said (this she said in a particularly affable way) she was afraid we should have wet before night.

"'Been here long?' I inquires.

"No, she hadn't been there long, she said. Only three weeks.

"'Come down with the duke's party, I suppose?'

"Yes, she said, she came down with the duke's party.

"'Like the place?'

"She said she didn't mind it. I asked her a few questions about the people. She said she could get on all right with the duke, and she was on awful good terms with the duchess; but she wouldn't give a shilling a gross for the servants. For one thing, she didn't believe they kept a proper look-out at the place. Whilst they were wasting their time in smoking and drinking and flirting, a burglar could get in at almost any moment.

"'Oh, well, miss, after all,' I says, 'we're none of us perfect, you know. We all have our little 'obbies.'

"I put on my best smile and made up my mind to have a dash for it. I asked her whether there was any chance of having a look in and a bit of supper in the evening. She looked at me very straight. Then she said a thing that knocked me silly.

"'I say, mister,' she says, 'where do I come in? How much am I going to make out of this little game?'

"I was so astonished that I quite blushed. I did, really.

"'Well,' I says, 'if you are going to put it that way, I suppose I'd better speak out straight. I'll give you twenty quid now, and I'll give you another twenty after it's over.'

"'Make it thirty sovereigns now and thirty after,' she said, 'and I'm your woman.'

"I started to argue a bit, and she turned on her heel.

"'Here stiddy on, my dear,' I says. 'Don't lose your temper. You've got a good-hearted face. You're not going to be hard on a poor chap, are you now? Give me a kiss and I'll give you twenty-five.'

"She fired up.

"'You don't have no kiss, mister,' she says, 'and if you want me to help you, you must hand over the coin. You kent do better, anyway.'

"I tell you she fairly knocked me over. I assure you, to look at her, you'd think she was as quiet a girl as ever wore shoes. She kept her eyes—bright, black eyes she had—fixed on my face, and seemed almost to enjoy the corner she'd got me in.

"I turned the matter quickly over in my mind. After all, I knew I needn't trouble about the second payment. I should be clear away before she had a chance to see whether I put it there or not.

"'All right, miss,' I says, 'don't 'aggle; and don't bite a feller's 'ead half 'orf. Here's the thirty pound. What time shall I come up?'

"She told me that at half-past eight the duke would be having dinner, and that she would leave the window of the duchess' dressing-room open. I might find a ladder in such a place, and, when I got in, I should find the jewels in such a place, and some loose notes and gold in such a place, and I was to leave my thirty pound for her on a ledge in the chimney. And if any of the other servants caught me, why, so much the worse for me, and if they did not, so much the worse for them. She shook hands pleasantly and went off towards the Court.

"I felt inclined to shake hands with myself, too. I knew that there was a good twenty thousand pounds' worth of stuff if I could only get a quiet quarter of an hour there.

"You may believe me when I say I was there that evening to the minute. Just as I neared the mansion I had a nasty feeling that the maid might have given me away. You can never be sure of women. But when I saw the window of the duchess' dressing-room open, and found the ladder and everything ready, I knew it was all right.

"'She's a girl after my own heart,' I said to myself when I got into the room. 'And I'll be after her's when it's all over.'

"It's risky work, you know. No matter how easy things are, you always have a queer sort of nervousness unless you're drunk, and then, of course, you're liable to make mistakes.

Digitized by Google

None of the servants was about; they might have been dead for all the trouble they gave me.

"I don't think I ever had quite such an easy job in all my life. 'This,' I said to myself—'This is better than your hard work any day. Honesty may be the best policy, but what do you make out of it? Eh? Do you make hauls of sackfuls of jewellery and money by honesty? Do you make enough in ten minutes to keep you for years, and drunk every night of your life, by honesty? No,' I said to myself (I had got the sack nearly full), 'if you want to get on in life, if you really want to have a nice little income and a life of happiness, have a turn at——'"

There was a swish of skirts near the bed. I turned my lantern on the place, my heart in my mouth, my revolver in my hand. I can tell you I was pleased to see that it was only my girl. I dropped my Colt back into my pocket. She was smartly dressed, and looked quite the lady.

"'Got everything, mister?' she inquired. 'Got everything?'

"'Well, not abslootly everything,' I whispered; 'but as much as I can carry. I'm just off.'

"'Have you put my thirty sovereigns in the chimney?' she asked. She had a head for business, that girl.

"'Reckon I'll take them now,' she said, calmly holding out her hand. 'I guessed you'd go and forget.'

"I counted out the money and handed it over, and shouldered my bag.

"'Good-bye, miss,' I whispers. 'See each other again soon, I hope.'

"'Awful good of you to say that,' she said. 'Feel as though I kent let you go now.' Her hand went to the side of the wall. 'We're getting on so sociable, and pleasant, and friendly like.'

"I can't tell you how it made me feel when I heard her talk like that. I would have proposed to that girl on the spot if I hadn't been so busy. Only there's a time and a place for everything, I always say, and just then wasn't the time to go canoodling about with girls.

"I went to her to give her a kiss and a good-bye. She gave a little scream.

"'Stop!' she cried. 'Stop, mister, or you're a dead man!'

"She levelled a shining little pocket pistol at my head, the other hand still pressing against the wall. There was a sound of hurried footsteps on the landing; the door opened, and a muscular young fellow in evening dress rushed in. He was followed by several servants.

"'My dearest Deborah,' he cried. Then he sprang upon me and nearly choked me.

"'Here, let go!' I screamed. 'Where's the duchess? Where's the duchess? Lemme go, can't ye. I want to tell her something. I want to tell her all about that beauty of a lady's-maid there. She's got my sixty pounds.'

"'And she jest about means to keep it,' she answered, laughing. 'It'll make a good start for my village blanket club.' She turned to the duke. 'Now, you see, Tunbridge, how Heron Court is protected.'

"'My dearest,' said the duke, 'you're quite right. You shall make your own arrangements now.'

"She spoke to one of the footmen.

"'Give him a good sousing, Barker, with the garden hose, and let him slide.'

"'Certainly, your grace. Now then, me man, this way.'

"And they took me, and, as I'm a living sinner, they ducked me. Had a narsty cold in me 'ead, I did, for years awter."

To prevent unnecessary labour, and consequent disappointment, to any readers of this paper, who in the past have forwarded original stories for insertion, we would take this opportunity of saying that our arrangements for the provision of matter for "Short Stories" are complete for some time to come.

A New Pair of Eyes

"OH, how perfectly delicious that is!" said Mrs. Conrad, enthusiastically. She had been seated very quietly holding a patch of brown and gold on the lap of her crêpe skirt, thrown there from the stained glass window with the angel and the lute on it. Miss Day's finger-tips had given a last feathery touch to the shortest of the harp strings, and George released the soft pedal which had been like a hand upon the mouth to a searching chord of the organ.

She had run in to pay an afternoon call, and Louie and George had played for her. Such a mocking widow in the declining stage of her crêpe! But she would not bate one thread of conventional gloom as tribute to poor Conrad until the last second of the full term of mourning was over, and that would not be until next month.

"Louie, can't you make us a cup of tea?" said George to his sister. "Be as long about it as you can," he whispered to her. "Two lumps of sugar for us both. Mrs. Conrad needs to be built up after this spasm of music."

As she whisked out George crossed the room. Mrs. Conrad had been on the most intimate terms with the Days for years. She was not much older than Louie. She was not even disturbed when George took her hand in his and said:

"Sadie, your time of mourning is nearly over, isn't it?"

"You mean, I suppose, my time of wearing black," she returned. "I shall drop it next month. And, George, I am almost sorry to moult my raven's plumage. It is awfully becoming."

"Anything is awfully becoming to you," he replied. "But, Sadie, I must be a little abrupt, because, although I told Louie to be as long as she could, one can't take very long to brew a cup of tea. I might as well say it without any fuss. I love you. I want to marry you."

"Why, George, you surprise me!" and she looked at him in a puzzled way. "Of course you love me. So do I love you, just as much as I do Louie. But, George, what an idea! I had never thought of marrying you."

"Well, if you love me, will you please think of it a moment, and then say, 'Why, yes, certainly?' I am easily satisfied."

He was so full of fun that he could not quite divest himself of a comical air, even now, when he was thoroughly in earnest.

"But, George, I don't love you in that way at all," expostulated the widow.

"Well, Sadie, it has been growing on me. It is a pity we are such good friends. You might feel the situation more if we weren't. But, Sadie, try and realise—won't you, please?—that I want you to be my wife, and that I shall not be very happy if you won't. Can't you love me enough for that?"

"Why, I do love you, George, but this seems so strange! I can't say yes, dear. I don't feel it a bit. And yet I love—that is, I am fond of you. Don't ask me such a thing. I don't want our pleasant relations marred. George, I couldn't marry you," she continued hurriedly, "I don't want to marry any one. This is only an idea. It is like a bit of your drollery. I am going away so soon to have a good turn on the Continent, and be so independent. You don't mind, George, do you?"

"Oh, certainly not. Don't mention it," replied the young fellow, with sarcastic good nature. "It's so pleasant to have such a reputation for tomfoolery that when you implore a woman to marry you she says, 'There, you droll thing, don't be so ridiculously funny!' Only, Sadie, I wish you would do me the justice to feel that I am not altogether playful; I don't know how to make you feel it, but I love you dearly, and I want to marry you ever so much. You know whether you care enough for me to marry me, and you can answer me as seriously as if I were a skeleton and death's head. For I am in earnest, Sadie."

Digitized by Google

She felt he was, and that confused her the more. She did not want to hurt his feelings. But she had never thought of George Day as a possible husband.

"Dear George, I am sorry, but I can't marry you," she faltered. "Don't be distressed about it. I can't help it."

"Here is Louie," exclaimed Mrs. Conrad under her breath. "Does she know anything about this, George?"

He shook his head slowly.

His sister entered the room, a servant following with the tea things. She darted a quick glance at the pair.

Louie came over with a cup of tea after the servant had withdrawn. She stood before Mrs. Conrad holding it in her hand as she said with mocking solemnity, "Sadie, did you say 'yes'?"

"Of course I did," asserted Mrs. Conrad. "George asked if my mourning would be over next month, and it will. What else could I say? I have the smartest tailor-made travelling suit of a pale brown."

"But didn't George ask you to marry him?" persisted Louie, holding the cup away from Mrs. Conrad's outstretched hand.

"What has happened to you all? Give me my tea, Louie. Of course George hasn't asked me to marry him. At least not since we were children, twelve years ago. People who have known each other for fifteen years don't want to marry."

"Give her the tea, Louie," said George, drily. "Do not let personal feeling interfere with strict justice. If Mrs. Conrad prefers to have somebody else pay for her tea for life, that is no reason why you should trample on the sacred name of hospitality."

"Well, Sadie," Louie said spitefully, "there is your tea. I know something dreadful will befall you for refusing George. I don't see how a woman can be so blind."

"This little episode mustn't interfere with the life-long friendship that has existed between us," said George in a very good imitation of his usual manner. "I daresay it was very indelicate in me to make such a proposal. I am willing to offer Mrs. Conrad every reparation a lady can demand."

"There! Now you are talking like yourself," said Mrs. Conrad, with a gusty sigh of relief. "George was overcome by the music. Don't say anything about it, Louie. We are awfully good friends, and always shall be. Won't we, George?"

"Until death do us part," he said, and shook her hand warmly. In diplomatic language the episode was closed.

Mrs. Conrad looked very nice and handsome in her new gown when she bade them good-bye a week later. She betook herself to the Continent and travelled to her heart's content for six months. Then she began to feel homesick. She wanted the Days. She wanted George. It was surprising to her that she missed him so much. In her thoughts she was constantly thinking, "I wish George was here. Dear George!"

One day she suddenly turned back. She was tired of being alone and yearned for Newtown. She wrote to the Days from Lucerne that she was coming, and soon after started.

It was a brilliant, clear day in spring when she arrived in her native town. As soon as she had her belongings settled in her house, she called on the Days. The windows were open and she heard the organ. George was playing the Wedding March from Lohengrin.

Mrs. Conrad, her face wreathed in smiles, forbade the servant to announce her, and tiptoed softly into the drawing-room. George was sitting at the organ playing with his wonted enthusiasm. She approached on tiptoe and put her warm, soft hands over his eyes without saying a word.

"Sadie!" he exclaimed instantly, and wheeled about holding out his hands. She grasped them. The expression in his eyes startled her.

"Aren't you glad to see me, George?" she demanded gaily. "Why do you look so oddly?"

"Come over here and sit down," he answered cheerfully.

"Sadie," said the young man in his cheerful tones, turning his face towards her, but without fixing his eyes upon her, "I have lost my sight. We didn't say anything about it in our letters for fear it would make you distressed. I am very glad to have you back. Did you have a good time?"

"Oh, George!" she cried, whipping out her handkerchief, "you don't mean that you are hopelessly blind?"

"That is it, exactly." His cheery tones and perfect calmness only made the bitterness of it the more keen. "But don't be anxious about it, Sadie. I knew it was coming, and I memorised all the music Louie and I play together, and there isn't really very much difference."

"Oh, George! What an angel you are!"

"You mustn't mind it, Sadie. It can't be helped. Of course I am grateful for your sympathy, but you will make me feel miserable, if you trouble so about it."

"But it is so sudden, George," she sobbed. "And it is so dreadful to think that one can do nothing."

"Oh, but you can. You must come in and read for me sometimes. I shall use your services very liberally. Don't cry."

"George," she said softly, "do you remember what you said to me the last time I sat here with you?"

"Oh, yes," he replied firmly. "But I thought we decided then that I was an idiot to endanger the pleasant relations between us."

"But, George, you really felt what you said then, didn't you?"

"What does it matter, now, Sadie?" he replied, a touch of weariness in his voice. "I have thoroughly reformed," he added, with his old laughing touch.

"Then you have discovered that you didn't—you know. You don't care for me any more, George?"

"What lovely logic! I have only reformed my tongue, not my feelings," he returned.

"Then George," she said softly, "say it again."

She felt quite at liberty to blush furiously, for, poor fellow, he could not see her.

He gave a start. Then he said very quietly, "Sadie, I know how warm and sympathetic you are. The sudden sight of my condition makes you feel such pity that you are overcome. It is very good of you, but you mustn't yield to this feeling. I am quite resigned. More so than ever, now that you are back. But I am not going to take the advantage of your pity."

"George, I came back because I couldn't stay away any longer. And though, of course, I do feel, more than I can tell, your sad misfortune, yet it isn't pity only that I feel."

"But, Sadie, you can't love a poor blind wretch!"

There was more bitterness in his voice than he had yet shown.

"Try me and see," said Sadie.

When Louie entered the room a little later Mrs. Conrad blushed a rosy red—her head was upon George's shoulder.

"Louie," said George with a joyous ring in his voice, "I have found a new pair of eyes. Sadie and I are going to be married."

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

THE week after next SHORT STORIES will appear in a very much altered and improved form. The number of pages will be increased from 16 to 32, and it will, in fact, contain just twice as much reading matter as at present. We are making arrangements with some of the foremost writers of the day to contribute to SHORT STORIES, and I feel justified in saying that in its new form this paper will be the biggest and the best pennyworth of popular literature ever produced. Special attention is intended to be given to the Serial Story. On the conclusion of the one at present running we shall commence another which has been specially written for us, and which will exceed in interest anything hitherto published in SHORT STORIES. We shall have a good deal more to say on this subject next week.

Digitized by Google

IN THE SECRET SERVICE.

THE bright, warm sunshine streamed along the white garden walk, glinted the precise rows of abalone shells, and furtively pushed its way through the low, open door into the cool, dark room, where he lay bandaged upon an easy chair. Reclining there luxuriously comfortable, his eyes dreamily wandered out and followed the massive adobe garden wall, with its old red tiles, until they met the California hills and the blue beyond showing through the arched, whalebone gate.

Suddenly the view was shut out; a dark-eyed girl stood in the doorway.

"Buenos dias, señor!" she cried blithely.

"Buenos dias, Doña Carlota?"

"That is very good, señor," laughed the girl. "Listen to the Spanish you hear and soon you will speak it, and be able to say something besides "good morning."

"But never enough to thank you for all you have done for me!"

"Ah! that is foolish to talk so"—with a pretty gesture of deprecation—"I did nothing. I found you lying in the cañon, and had you brought to our house. Who would not have done that?"

She took a stool close beside him, resting her chin in her hands, her big dark eyes fixed intently upon his face. He thought her the most ingenious as well as the most beautiful woman he had ever seen.

"Tell me more about yourself," she broke out, impulsively, as she placed a warm hand upon one of his. "When the fever was on you, I could not talk to you; but now you are almost well. Where did you come from, and what were you doing in the cañon? And you say your name is George Hilliard?"

"Did I tell you that?"

"Si; Don Jorge Hilliard."

"Carlota"—with some anxiety—"you must not repeat what I have told you. I cannot tell you now what brought me here."

And certainly he was delighted when he saw that his strange admonition brought no sign of doubt or suspicion into her face.

"It matters not, señor," she went on; "you are here now, and you will stay until you get well, and perhaps longer. My mother will not let you go."

"But, José?"

"José? Bah! Look! it is this way, señor. I have not many friends. The Americans, and the, what you call, Spanish do not mix together here. Spanish! Most of them are not Spanish, but Mexicans, South Americans, Portuguese, and Indians. The Machados are Castilians, señor, but I am an American. I was born here. I have been to the convent at Santa Barbara. That is why I speak such good English. I like Americans. Yes, my mother"—to a voice calling from another room—"I am coming," and she was gone.

Hilliard looked fondly after her as she left the room. Of course, he knew that she was in love with him—in love as only a Spanish woman can be. And he? Well, why not? Did he not owe his life to her? Was she not beautiful and good?

The days went by, and it was very pleasant for him. Never was convalescence more enjoyed. Carlota talked to him, and read to him, and tried to teach him Spanish.

Whether or not la Señora Madre approved of the violent flirtation going on under her roof and nose, was difficult to determine. She spoke "no Ingles," and her dark face was absolutely bereft of expression.

It was altogether different with José Sanchez. His intense hatred for the invalid and his fierce love for the girl were alike apparent. He galloped in from the ranche—which Carlota said was fifteen miles distant—almost daily, and spent hours in the room with the two, silently watching them, or else walked nervously about the garden smoking yellow paper cigarettes.

Carlota's artless and frank admission that José loved her, charmed the American; but he knew, nevertheless, that he had in him a rival not to be despised, and possibly to be feared. At the outset, he had made an effort to extend him more than the usual affability. He even presented him with an expensive cigarette-holder, which had been given him by an old sweetheart. But José, although he accepted the present, remained sullen, silent, and implacable.

It was not until the time came for Hilliard to make his departure that he asked Carlota to become his wife. Somehow a proposal of marriage had seemed to him an almost unnecessary proceeding, for he had made no effort to conceal his feelings, and Carlota, in her delightful simplicity, had given her heart to him without a struggle. The proposal, therefore, was not an ordeal.

But he had a mission to perform—one known only to himself. Promising Carlota to return in a few days, he took a train, ostensibly for San Francisco, and left it at the first station. Back he trudged until within a mile of the town, and then, leaving the road, he followed a trail into the mountains. It led him to the edge of a precipice, where great masses of earth and rocks, loosened by winter rains, had years before slid down as in an avalanche. Standing in the thick chaparral, it was easy for him now to see how he had walked over the brink. He leant over and looked down on the very spot where he had fallen.

Then he started on a cautious but seemingly erratic search for something in the mountain fastness. Backwards and forwards under the trees, down into gulches, beneath overhanging rocks, through narrow passes, and along steep trails, he went.

Late in the afternoon he found the object of his search. It was a cabin almost hidden by the branches of a fallen tree. From his pocket he took a revolver, examined it, and then moved stealthily towards the hut. It was deserted; he pushed back the door and entered. There was nothing unusual about the bare interior; a heap of charred embers on the hearth was the only sign that it had been occupied.

The embers interested him at once. On his knees he examined them carefully, sifted the ashes with his hands, and was rewarded by finding a broken die that had quite recently made counterfeit coins. With an exclamation of satisfaction, he took it to the light to inspect it more closely. Something on the floor at the threshold attracted his attention. He picked it up. It was an ornamental cigarette-holder—the one he had given José.

The following morning saw him back in the town, walking rapidly towards the house of the Machados. During the night, after long study, he had formulated a plan whereby Carlota and her mother would be spared the mortification consequent upon the publicity of the proposed arrest. José would be taken quietly away and no one would know of it.

He passed quickly through the gate, along the garden walk, and into the dwelling. Carlota's hat and gloves were on a table. A moment he stood there looking down upon them, and then the mother entered, expressionless as ever, and silently handed him a note. He opened it and read:

"Señor Don Jorge Hilliard:—I cannot marry you, because I have married Don José Sanchez. We sail from America to-day. Don José would have gone long ago, but he would not leave without me. I learnt your business after you were brought to our house, and thought it well to keep you there. I cannot tell you whither we sail. You are in the secret service. So am I. Adios.—CARLOTA."

POSTAL RATES.

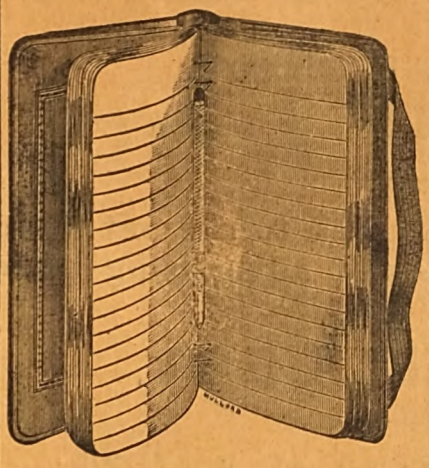
SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

COLLINS'
"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK.
WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST AND THE BEST.
THE SIMPLEST AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register" the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,
Bridewell Place, London, E.C.; 139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL
BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
SUCH AS
Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.
In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.
Prepared only by the Proprietor,
THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.
Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 Pieces

for £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

FOR THE SMALL SUM OF 6s. 6d. WE WILL SEND AS FOLLOWS:—

NOT A TOY.

We give you A WATCH.

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.	FOR 6s. 6d.
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsome

KEYLESS WATCHES,

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

"Lowick-by-Beale, Northumberland, August 17.

"GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.

"Very truly yours,
"WILLIAM McISAAC."

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

"11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

"GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.

"I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,
"LEWIS C. RHODES."

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation. Money returned if not as represented.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call, or send to-day for the

6s. 6d. MONSTER PRESENTATION PARCEL INCLUDING THE HANDSOME KEYLESS WATCH.

S. S. GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE NEXT ISSUE OF SHORT STORIES, CONTAINING 32 PAGES, WILL BE PUBLISHED ON AUGUST 2ND.

SHORT STORIES

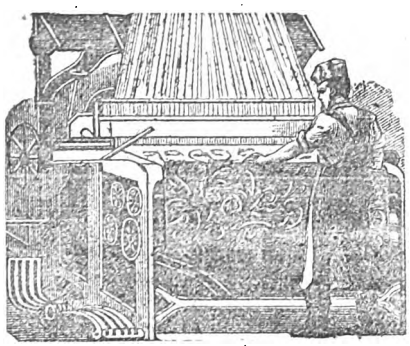
EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 344. FOR WEEK ENDING AUGUST 3, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

BE SURE TO CUT

IT MAY NOT APPEAR AGAIN. THIS OUT.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY.



THIS PHENOMENAL OFFER is made to the readers of SHORT STORIES only. On receipt of this advertisement, accompanied by Postal Order for 6s. or 74 stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our genuine SEAMLESS, WOVEN REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., handsomely bordered, and woven in thirty different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and LARGE ENOUGH TO COVER ANY ORDINARY SIZED ROOM. These Carpets are manufactured from a material equal in wear to wool, and are undoubtedly the cheapest in the world.

With every Carpet we shall ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send two CARPETS and Two RUGS for 10s. 6d.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness, they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value."

Thousands of Testimonials similar to the following, and Repeat Orders have been received from our customers.

"16, Clarendon Villas.
"West Brighton.

"DEAR SIR,—I beg to thank you for your prompt attention to my wire of Friday. The Carpet came duly to hand on Saturday, and I am exceedingly pleased with it, so much so that I purpose calling at your warehouse one day this week, when I expect to be in town, to see if I can supply myself with two more to suit my present requirements. Yours faithfully, W. HEATH HAYWOOD."

"45, George Street, Plymouth.

"GENTLEMEN,—The Carpet is duly to hand, and gives entire satisfaction.—Yours truly, J. C. PICKFORD."

"Mullaghmore.

"I beg to acknowledge receipt of Carpets, with which I am very pleased; they are splendid value for the money, and far superior to what I expected. Later on I shall be pleased to favour you with further orders.—Yours sincerely, H. CUNNINGHAM."

This offer is made to the readers of this paper only, and may not be repeated. All orders despatched same day as received. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "Union Bank," and made payable to J. HARGREAVES, Sec. Established 1872. Address—

THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.,
31, OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

NOT APPEAR AGAIN.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S, LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

1 RISING SUN STOVE POLISH. EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD.

In HALF the TIME with HALF the LABOUR you can produce MORE POLISH with TWO Penny Packets of RISING SUN than with HALF-DOZEN of ordinary Blacklead.

Sold in ½d., 1d. & 2d. Packets

THREE GREAT BOONS

Sample of any one post free 2 stamps C. Chancellor & Co., London, E.C.

3 MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH. CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS PURE BORAX, GUM, WAX, & SOAP.

REQUIRES no addition or preparation. SAVES time, labour, and uncertainty. PRODUCES beautiful white glossy linen.

Sold in 1d. Packets, or 3d. and 6d. Boxes.

2 RISING SUN METAL POLISH. GIVES TO ALL KINDS OF METALS A BEAUTIFUL SOFT BRILLIANT POLISH.

With the MINIMUM of LABOUR this LIQUID POLISH produces a MOST BRILLIANT APPEARANCE, which lasts much longer than that produced by any Paste Polish.

Sold in 1d, 3d, 6d, & 1/- Bottles

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

MADAME FRAIN'S
FAMOUS
FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.
Sold also by all Chemists.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.
Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,
E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

HAIR DESTROYED

Root and Branch absolutely exterminated without injury to the skin, entirely new treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TOO STOUT.

Prof. Holt's "H.D." Pills for Fat People

A rapid, permanent, and absolutely safe reduction, averaging 5 lbs. weekly, with improved Health and Figure, and without dietary restriction, guaranteed to all (either sex). Will reduce weight and cure corpulency in the most stubborn cases where other treatments have failed. They are small, entirely vegetable, agreeable, harmless, and highly recommended. Price, post free, plain wrapper, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box.—Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

RED NOSES

caused by Indigestion, and all who suffer from this distressing and disfiguring complaint, should write to Dr. HOWELL, 22, Glasshouse Street, W., who guarantees a Cure in a few days.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticisms, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

TOOTH-ACHE
CURED INSTANTLY BY
BUNTER'S NERVINE
Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.
Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES.

Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, (Rooms O), Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

ONE BOX OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free, 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use
Dr. Mackenzie's
Arsenical Toilet Soap.
1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY,
Balham Hill, London, S.W.
Beware of injurious imitations.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.
Pattern and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.
JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

New Harrison. SWIFT GOLD MEDAL.
KNITTER

KNITS STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" & "SUN" Machines.
HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 344.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING AUGUST 3, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

HOW JACK'S AUNT WENT CRAZY

CHAPTER I.

"FIFTEEN minutes' wait!"

The train for England drew up at Amiens station, bringing to an end a painful talk between two people in a first-class carriage.

"The long and the short of it is, Lilla, you will have to put this nonsense out of your head," said Captain Jones, as he opened the door.

He was a good-looking man, with stern eyes and a determined jaw. He might have been at least a dozen years older than his sister, who, however, had defended herself through a course of bullying all the way from Paris.

"You had better come and have some luncheon."

"No," she said; "I don't want any."

"Don't be a goose."

"I'm not hungry. I would rather stay here."

Under any other circumstances Captain Jones would have stuck to his point till he gained it. But in this case it would have meant losing his own luncheon, so he shrugged his shoulders, and walked away with the stream of passengers towards the refreshment-room.

Lilla sat quite still in her place. She was a girl of twenty, and might have been very pretty if her features and expression had been a little less decided. Her eyes were remarkable—large, blue, and grave, with straight brows and dark lashes. She was pale, but her complexion was clear and good. Sometimes, when she was amiable, she did look very pretty, and at all times she was handsome. She was plainly dressed, and her manner was cool and straightforward.

Just now she looked anything but happy; paler and graver than usual, frowning slightly and sadly, as she sat alone by the carriage window and gazed across the lines at the crowded station. She could see her brother's broad shoulders disappearing into the buffet, and thought, as she watched him, how horribly disagreeable he was. As if a woman of twenty might not decide for herself! Just personal prejudice, and nothing more. He was so narrow-minded; he thought everybody ought to be made on his own pattern. What could be more ridiculous!

Just now she looked anything but happy.

Some sort of dimness, a dimness of vexation, clouded Lilla's eyes, as she thought of the long, weary argument she had just gone through. Of course, she was not weak-minded enough to cry; but it is terribly hopeless work trying to convince one's brother, or even to make him understand that one means to have one's own way. After about five minutes of peace, and a strange stillness, for the train was nearly empty, Lilla was startled from her thoughts by a voice from the platform below.

"May I ask if this carriage is full?"

She looked, and saw an elderly woman, carrying a bag and some shawls. Her voice was breathless, and very tired; but there was a curious charm in it, a high sweet tone; and as she lifted anxious eyes to Lilla, a very pretty smile lighted up her pale, delicate face. She was extremely well dressed, but looked a little dishevelled. Lilla wondered instinctively what she had done with her maid.

With the unaffected readiness which belonged to her, she instantly made the stranger welcome, took her bag and shawls, helped her to climb into the carriage, and thought with satisfaction how disappointed Percy would be, when he came back, to find that his brotherly scoldings could not go on in peace all the way to Boulogne.

"Oh, thank you; how very kind you are!" said the stranger, looking earnestly at Lilla, and smiling sweetly. "This is delightful. I thought I should never get away from that odious place, and the train seemed so full. There is room for me here, really?" looking round at Percy's scattered belongings with a touch of alarm.

"Yes; there is only my brother," said Lilla.

"How providential! What a place this is to get away from! I never stopped here before; but something happened yesterday in Paris which put me out dreadfully, and I felt too ill, and too cross, to start early in the morning, so I came as far as Amiens in the afternoon. Such a stupid thing to do. I had to leave my poor maid in Paris; she was ill—left her with a friend, you know—and then my—well, my escort disappointed me, and I couldn't sleep last night—and really, do you know

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

that ever since this train came in I have been wandering up and down trying to find a carriage.

Lilla was not a talkative girl. After doing what she could for the lonely lady, and listening with sufficient politeness to her history, she fell back into her own grave silence, and watched the platform till she saw Percy coming back. The stranger thought, "What a severe face! The girl is unhappy, I believe; but I like her, too. Now that is the sort of girl——"

Captain Jones's arrival at the door disturbed these meditations. He hesitated a moment, while his sister looked at him gravely. Then he said: "Give me my coat and things, will you? I am going to smoke;" and he took himself off to another carriage.

When he was gone, the strange lady began to talk to Lilla, who, in spite of herself, had to respond to these advances. There was something very pleasant, though not very wise, about her companion, who chattered of France and Paris, and abused England, and said a great many things that Lilla totally disagreed with.

"Oh, yes, many of the French manners and customs are most superior to ours," said this lady, talking so fast that Lilla—English to the backbone—could not contradict her. "Their marriages, for instance—how sensible they are! and how happy!"

"No, horrible. I can't bear them!" exclaimed Lilla; but her companion hardly seemed to hear this.

"Of course," she said, "people's friends and relations know them better than they know themselves. Well, what a comfort not to be allowed to throw themselves away on the first person they take a fancy to. Oh dear, what nonsense! Two silly children without a penny, binding themselves down to a life of misery, finding out too late that they don't suit each other in the least. And if they were French everything would be arranged easily and carefully—money and all the rest of it. Frenchmen never make stupids of themselves. I wish my nephew was a Frenchman!"

She said this half to herself, and sighed. Then she looked at Lilla. "Yes," she said, "I am in great trouble."

Lilla was looking at her with an earnest interest which was certainly encouraging. There was a kind of wistfulness in her eyes, and she said: "But one's relations don't know what is best for one. I am quite sure of that."

"Well," said the lady after a pause, smiling very prettily, "if I happened to be your grandmother I think we should disagree about that. However, we all speak from our own experience. Now, I have a nephew, who at this moment is driving me quite mad by his detestable obstinacy. He has fallen in love with some girl I never saw or heard of, and wants to marry her at once. Now, listen. It is really a relief to me to tell somebody, and I'm sure you are sympathising and kind."

Lilla shook her head a little, but the stranger smiled and went on. "I don't want to boast of what I have done for Jack, but I must tell you, that you may judge between us. He has never had any money, and never will have any, except what I give him. I paid for his education, which was an utter farce from beginning to end. He never passed a single examination; failed in everything he tried for, simply from idleness, for I don't think he is naturally stupid. Idleness, ingratitude, selfishness.

"Now he coolly tells me that he is going to be married, and, of course, expects me to support his wife as well as himself, for she has nothing. Some stray girl he met abroad; no doubt as odious as English girls abroad generally are. Our tempers are neither of them sweet, and I must tell you that Jack and I were very angry with each other. He declared that he expected nothing from me, which was utter falsehood and nonsense. So we wished each other good-bye. He may go his way, and I shall go mine. I shall certainly do nothing for him, and I think he knows it. As to my money, it shall go to somebody who deserves it."

She looked Lilla straight in the face as she spoke. There certainly was something very strange and unusual in this outpouring from an utter stranger. In theory, there was nothing Lilla disliked more. She hated effusive people, who talked of their own concerns, and thought they must interest everybody. But here was a contradiction. This woman's talk really interested Lilla. She listened attentively to every word; odd little thrills seemed to run through her as the story went on; her eyes deepened, and a faint colour rose in her pale cheeks. Lilla was at her prettiest now, and the stranger, looking at her, almost forgot her own troubles in admiration.

"What do you think?" she said, after a minute's silence. "I am right, am I not?"

"I don't know," said Lilla, with much more hesitation than was usual with her. "You couldn't expect, could you, that your nephew would give up the girl, if they really cared for each other? Perhaps she is a much nicer girl than you think."

"Oh, no, no; I don't believe it. Of course he says she is lovely. He wanted to show me her photograph, but I wouldn't look at it. But don't you understand—even if she was an angel—he has no business to think of marrying at all. And he has engaged himself without even the politeness of consulting me. You would never forget all your duties and principles in that sort of way."

"Yes, indeed I should. I do," said Lilla quickly, with a sudden blush. "My brother thinks me just as bad—just as obstinate and ungrateful, as you think your nephew."

"Then I am sure your brother is mistaken." The stranger spoke as quickly and decidedly as Lilla herself, but with such a look and tone of kindly sweetness that Lilla suddenly moved from her own place, and sat down beside her. Almost directly her new friend took her hand, and held it while they talked together. This sympathy, so strangely met, brought Lilla's troubles rushing to her lips and eyes. She had no mother, no kind, foolish aunt, no one but a married elder sister, from whom she expected nothing but blame. Percy thought she had been making a terrible little silly of herself, and the world in general was sure to agree with him.

She told her fellow-traveller that she and Percy had been in the South of France, and had there met a young man sketching, who meant to be an artist. They had seen a great deal of him, and at last, one day—but Lilla did not enter much into her version of the old story.

Lilla's lover had no money; he had no profession; but he was extremely, brilliantly clever, dressed beautifully, and was sure to be a great artist some day. He seemed to think that some relations might help him a little just at first, and Lilla thought her brother Percy, who was unmarried, and well off, might do the same for her. But Percy took a very different view of the subject. He did not at all share his sister's faith in the artist's future; he wanted her to marry a friend of his own, a rich man, who admired her.

"Percy wants me to write to him, and tell him—but no, that I will never do," said Lilla, sadly and strongly. "I see we shall have to wait for years. I told him I thought so. He didn't seem to think so—but anyhow, he knows it will make no difference to me."

So they went on talking as their train hurried through France. Lilla could hardly believe, afterwards, that she had actually told all her history, and poured out her whole heart to a person she had never met in her life before; but then this was such a wonderful person. She began to realise what she had done when they saw the sandhills and the sea, and then rushed on to Boulogne through the green bruyères and the fir trees.

"I ought not to have talked like this; but you have been so very kind and I really am unhappy," she said.

Then the strange woman took her hand again.

"My dear, you must not be unhappy. Trust me and don't be unhappy. I think I see a way out of your troubles, only don't give in, whatever you do."

In spite of her beating heart and her heavy eyelids, Lilla could hardly help laughing at her friend's inconsistency.

"Give in! Oh, no!" she said. "But I'm afraid you are much more hopeful than I am."

"We shall see. In the meantime will you give me your address?"

"Yes; thank you so much. I do hope we shall meet again." Lilla hastily pulled a letter out of her pocket.

Digitized by Google

Then she coloured a little, and hesitated. Then she took the letter out of the envelope, and gave the envelope to her friend, saying half aloud, "I have no other."

Looking at the letter in her hand, and putting it back in a safe place, she missed the first expression on her friend's face, which was that of extreme astonishment, almost anger, quickly succeeded by intense amusement.

"Miss Lilla Jones," she read out, in such an extremely odd voice that Lilla was startled.

"Is there anything wrong?" she said.

"No, my dear, nothing. Only your direction in the South of France is not of much use to me."

"Oh, I'm so sorry. Please give it me back. I can find a scrap of paper, I dare say."

"No, no; I like this. Write your English address on it—there's plenty of room."

"And—may I have yours?" asked Lilla, when she had obeyed.

"No; it doesn't matter about me. You shall hear from me. We shall know all about each other in time. Here we are. Thank you for a miserable journey turned into a happy one."

"You have comforted me very much," said Lilla gratefully; but she was rather at a loss to understand her friend's meaning. The happiness of the journey, to all seeming, had only consisted in having the knowledge of another person's troubles added to her own.

CHAPTER II.

JACK, as his aunt, Mrs. Lindsay, always called him—this was only a pet name, the world in general knowing him as Reginald Carr—Jack was very much surprised at receiving a kind letter from his aunt, a few days after she had cast him off for ever. The beginning of the letter was kind, at least; the latter part seemed totally unreasonable.

Jack was staying on at the hotel in Paris, where he had come on purpose to meet his aunt, and to break the news of his engagement. From former experience he had quite expected that his aunt, after storming a little, would kiss him and give her consent. He was then going to take her back to England, where his further plans would soon arrange themselves. But her horrid obstinacy had knocked everything on the head. Jack did not know what to do with himself, and so, for the present, was finding a little amusement in Paris. He was very painfully conscious that he could not marry on nothing. At the same time he could not possibly give up the girl with whom he was so much in love. He was furiously angry with his aunt.

Jack stood on the hearthrug.

In this letter she invited, or rather ordered, him to come to London at once, naming a particular day and hour when she desired to see him. She went on to say that she had met the person to whom she intended to leave all her money. "But there is still a loophole for you," she wrote; "you do not deserve anything at all; but come here at once, and we shall see whether we understand each other any better than we did."

"Hang the old woman and her money! What on earth does she mean?" said Jack, with other exclamations of the same kind. "She's mad. I wish she and her money had never been heard of. It's too bad, to bring a fellow up to expect a thing, and then disappoint him after all. Who has she picked up now, I wonder! I'll be hanged if I go. I'd require to pack at once."

He did go, however, not being quite such a proud and rash young man as he supposed himself, having also a private reserve of love and respect for his aunt, however ungrateful his words and thoughts might be—but he went in a very bad temper. He left his luggage, which was immense, at Charing Cross Station, and drove in a hansom to his aunt's house, not being sure whether she meant him to stay with her. She said nothing about that, but received him kindly, and gave him luncheon, for he had arrived early in the day, according to the sudden and queer request.

There was something very odd about the old lady. Jack, who was inclined just then to take a dark view of all things, thought she was going out of her mind.

"Well, you have told me nothing about your journey. Was it rough? Had you pleasant companions?"

"Yes, awfully rough. Don't know; didn't look at them; they were Frenchmen, mostly. By-the-bye, how did you get on?"

"Ah, by-the-bye, the first time I ever travelled from Paris to London alone. Well, I stopped at Amiens, you know—a great mistake, and yet it wasn't. I believe it was one of the best things I ever did in my life."

"How was that?" said Jack, trying to seem interested.

"Well, from Amiens to Boulogne—on to London, in fact—I had the most charming fellow-traveller. She helped me, she took care of me, she did everything for me; she told me all her history, and we became friends for life. I found that there was only one thing she wanted to make her happy, and I determined that she should have it."

"What?" said Jack suspiciously. He guessed what was coming now, and thought himself most abominably treated. Not even one of the Lindsays, her husband's relations! but an accidental woman picked up in a railway carriage! Some sharp, designing creature, who had got round his aunt and made a fool of her. It was no surprise when Mrs. Lindsay answered his question—"Plenty of money."

Jack threw himself back in his chair. He tried to look as if this was nothing to him; but scowled hideously at a picture over the chimneypiece.

"It's a common complaint, and a difficult cure," he said. "Well, go on, Aunt. Is she French or English, young or old?"

"English, young, and very pretty," said his aunt. "At least, I am sure you would say so."

"I bet you I shouldn't," replied Jack. "I haven't that desperate admiration for every girl I meet."

"I know that, but I know the sort of thing you do admire. Now, Jack, suppose that you and I have a bet on the subject—ten pounds, if you like."

"No, thank you, I can't afford it," said Jack, smiling grimly. "Besides, I'm not likely to see her, unless she has taken up her abode with you. And you can't expect me to like the notion of her—particularly."

"I am sorry for you, Jack, really," said Mrs. Lindsay. "But it's all your own fault. I have made up my mind, and I can't change it now."

"No, so it seems," said Jack, getting up and shrugging his shoulders. "Why didn't you let me stay in Paris?"

"A very bad place for you. Besides, as I told you, there is a loophole. I will give you another chance."

"What's that?"

"You may marry her," said Mrs. Lindsay abruptly; and then she went to the other end of the room, and stood there fidgeting with some flowers, turning her back to her nephew.

Jack stood on the hearthrug, with his hands in his pockets.

Digitized by Google

First he laughed an unflattering laugh to Mrs. Lindsay's new favourite; then he said: "Did you really send for me from Paris to tell me that, Aunt?"

For a moment she seemed to misunderstand him in some way. She turned round quickly, with an exclamation on her lips: "You don't——." But then she stopped herself as quickly, for poor Jack looked angry and dejected. "Well, you need not be scornful," she said. "My friend is very much too good for you. How do you know that she will have you, after all?"

"I don't see how you know it, either," he said. "But she won't be asked, so it doesn't matter."

"Look here, my dear Jack. You are ruining yourself; you are losing your last chance. The fact is simply this: if you marry anyone but this friend of mine, I won't leave you a penny. You may go your own way; you may go to the dogs, if you like."

"Thank you, I will," said Jack. He walked towards the door, but then he turned round again and faced his aunt, looking extremely grave.

Just then came a visitor's knock.

"Here she is," said Mrs. Lindsay. "I asked her to come and see me this afternoon. Well, Jack, then you have quite made up your mind; you won't marry her? Perhaps it was too much to expect. Don't rush out of that door; you will meet her. Go out this way, into the study; wait there for ten minutes, and then come back to me. I should like you to see her, though of course my plan won't do."

"I don't want to see her. I'll go off at once, thank you."

"Jack, you will do no such thing. You need not stay in the room. You need only come in and say good-bye to me, if you like. You may be just as rude and sulky as you please—but I want you to see her. Go!"

Jack fled, for the visitor was coming in. It was Miss Lilla Jones. She looked very pretty, and very well dressed. Mrs. Lindsay received her with eager kindness, and after thanking her many times for coming, began to talk seriously.

"I have been thinking a great deal about you," she said, "since we parted, and if you will let me, I am going to speak very plainly. First of all, my dear, it will never do for you to marry a poor man."

Lilla smiled, coloured, and looked at her rather sadly.

"Your brother is perfectly right, you know. It is a dreadful look-out for you. Now listen to me. I told you in the train the other day how much I liked French marriages, and how wise I thought them. Do you remember? Well, now I have taken it into my head to arrange a marriage for you—one to which your brother can't possibly object. I want you to give up all your wild ideas, and to be good and sensible, and to make me and all your friends very happy—by marrying my nephew."

Lilla's face fell in a wonderful manner. She stared at Mrs. Lindsay in blank astonishment, and the only thought that crossed her mind was, "Poor dear thing, she is crazy!" She began to wish herself safe out of the house, was in fact a little frightened, and did not in the least know what to say.

"But you know——I told you——" she stammered out. "I thought you understood——"

"I understood perfectly," said Mrs. Lindsay smiling. "But I have just been talking to my nephew. I told him that he must give up all his nonsensical ideas, and offer himself to you. My dear, if you will marry him I will leave all my money to him, and allow him fifteen hundred a year now. But if you won't, I intend to cut him off with a shilling, but I think in that case I shall leave everything to you. There's only one difficulty."

"More than one, I should think—but what is the one?" asked Lilla, as quietly as she could.

"He declares he will have nothing to do with you. He will not give up that girl he met in France. But I think, when he sees you——"

"Please, Mrs. Lindsay, don't let us have any more talk like this," said Lilla, getting up, with scarlet cheeks and eyes shining with surprise and anger. "You can't be serious in anything you are saying. You can't mean it—but your whole plan is perfectly impossible. How could I accept your money—a perfect stranger—and as to—I never heard such extraordinary things in my life."

Mrs. Lindsay watched her for a moment, and an odd convulsion passed over her face. Then she got up, came across to the girl, took her face between her hands and kissed her, looking at her with such happy, loving eyes that Lilla's tears were checked.

"I really am fiendish!" said Mrs. Lindsay, and she sprang across to the door, opened it, and called Jack.

He came slowly forward from the study.

"Come in, Jack," said his aunt. "Here is my friend. You need not be at all afraid of meeting her. She will have nothing whatever to say to you, and you are exactly in the same state of mind towards her. But you both think you have to do with an old madwoman, so please indulge her last fancy by shaking hands. Jack! You are forgetting yourself, sir! This is disgraceful!"

For Jack cried out, "Lilla!" and Lilla gave a little scream, and they did not meet at all as strangers, but as lovers long parted, while Mrs. Lindsay, whose remonstrances were useless, walked away smiling to the window.

Hitherto the most important thing that occurred on August 2nd in the world's history was the Battle of Blenheim, 1704. But what was this paltry battle compared with what will happen on the next Second of August?

ON THAT DAY WE START A NEW SERIES OF

SHORT STORIES.

WE ARE increasing the number of pages from 16 to 32. WE ARE issuing the paper in a much more convenient and attractive form. WE ARE doubling the amount of reading matter. WE ARE NOT increasing the price.

THE CLEVEREST WRITERS WILL WRITE FOR SHORT STORIES,
" " ARTISTS " ILLUSTRATE " "
AND EVERYBODY WHO HAS HIS OR HER HEAD SCREWED ON THE RIGHT WAY WILL READ SHORT STORIES.

During the last few months SHORT STORIES has just doubled its Circulation. There is a rage for the "short story" at present, and it is while this rage is prevalent that we want to show we can give the best pennyworth of it that four farthings can procure. Hence the alterations and improvements.

REMEMBER THE FIRST OF THE NEW SERIES IS TO BE OBTAINED AUGUST 2.

Digitized by Google

THE PASSING OF TERRY O'FLAHERTY

NO one who had driven through the lodge gate and had noticed the merry face of Ellen, the gatekeeper, would be likely soon to forget it. She usually wore a pink calico dress, which was always scrupulously neat, and fitted her trim figure to a T. Her ribbons were pink, her cheeks pink, and the children declared that her hair was pink also. It was really a very pretty shade of light red, and it crinkled in a bewitching way.

What a charming picture she made, framed by the arched window, the grey stone covered closely with luxuriant ivy! She was always smiling, and had a gay word of repartee for her fellow-servants; a deferential but cheerful greeting for her superiors; jokes and amusing stories for the children; and when all alone she sang the jolliest Irish songs and ballads, with a laughing lilt in her voice, which was so irresistible that the guests at the villa often sat for hours on the veranda, where, unknown to her, they could hear Ellen sing.

Altogether she was the most light-hearted, merry little woman you ever saw, and we were all surprised to see her appear on Sunday in full widow's weeds. We met her just returning from church, and remarked on the exuberance of health and spirit displayed by the sable-robed figure, though we did not at first recognise it. Through the folds of the heavy crape I saw a glint of the red-gold hair, and there was something in her buoyant step which recalled the measure of those lilting choruses. I believe she was thinking them over, and keeping time to their beat and swing as she walked.

I suspected at once that this was no ordinary widow bowed down by a heavy weight of woe, and when O'Flaherty, the coachman, turned on his box and threw her a kiss as we passed, we also turned and saw the crape veil thrown back and Ellen's rosy face framed by a coquettish widow's cap.

"Is Ellen in grief?" I asked.

"Not at all," my hostess answered, laughing; "she is only in deep mourning, and enjoys it very much."

"Some distant relative, I presume, who has left her money?"

"On the contrary; it is in honour of her husband, to whom she was very tenderly attached, and for whom she has resisted the most persistent attentions of lovers through two long years of widowhood. Is it not so, O'Flaherty?"

The privileged coachman coughed and chuckled. "It's about so, mum," he admitted.

"Ellen a widow!" I exclaimed. "Why, she is the merriest one I ever saw. You are talking in riddles; will you be kind enough to explain your meaning?"

"Ellen must tell you," my friend replied; and that afternoon I strolled down to the lodge, intent on unravelling the mystery. Ellen wore a neat black sateen, flecked with a tiny white figure resembling snowflakes Muslin cuffs were folded back from her wrists in the most approved style. Some violets and a black folded handkerchief were tucked in her belt. Ellen was evidently still sustaining her character as a bewitching little widow. We had had some previous conversation, and I soon made an opportunity of telling her that I was sorry to hear of her bereavement.

"Oh, yes, mum," she admitted, "I felt very bad intirely—for a spell. It's a dreadful thing, mum, to lose one's husband, and I hope you will never suffer the likes."

I felt not a little indignant at Ellen's show of grief, for the minx looked so complacent in her widow's weeds that I was sure that whatever she might have suffered was more than made up to her by a sense of their becomingness. I fancied, too, that as I entered the lodge, I had seen O'Flaherty, the coachman, sneak out of the back door, and I could not help saying rather spitefully: "Time brings consolation, Ellen, and I should not be surprised if you married a second time."

A look of real pain and indignation came into Ellen's face. "Niver, mum! Do you think I could marry anyone else but my own Terry? Shure, it's mistaken you are; the saints forgive you! Why, we niver quarrelled but once, and that was the day I lost him. It's many's the bitter tear I've shed for that."

I saw that Ellen was in earnest, and felt that I did not quite understand this odd mixture of loyalty and vanity. "Tell me about it," I said, as kindly as I could. "How did you lose your husband?"

"It was this way, mum," Ellen explained. "When we were first married, I was waitress at the house, an' Terence was under-gardener, an' oh, mum, we were that happy an' comfortable until the misthress' sister came to spend the summer here, an' brought a peck of misery for us in all them thrunks of hers, bad luck to her! Mrs. Delacey her name was, a stoilish young widder, who never wasted many tears on her husband, but made up for that with her bumbazines or her grinny-dines, an' the crapes you could pull through a gould ring; an' the silky stuff they call foolhardy."

"Foolhardy? I never heard of any such material, Ellen. I have it! You must mean foulard."

"Well, be it fool hard or fool soft, I know not. I only know that she made a fool of ivery man that came nigh her, the craythe r! an' I was as foolish as a man over her gowns. I unpacked her dresses for her, an' hung 'em up in the cupboard, an' that avenin' I was goin' on to Terence about thim gowns till I misthrust he was sick of hearin' me, for he answered me crosslike. You know how men is, mum; the misthress tells me you have a husband yourself. Well, I niver took no warnin', but kept on tellin' him how the butler tould me that whin Mrs. Delacey wore her black Brussels net, with the black pearls on her snowy neck, at the hunt ball, the Juke of what's-his-name, he says: 'Who is that raquiem in lace?' says he, 'shinin' out like a snow-flake forninst a chimney-stack.'

"'What's a raquiem?' says Terry.

"'It's a song they sing at a wake,' says I, 'an' the Juke said it must be very flatterin' to her husband to know that such a lovely young craythe r was mournin' for him in such foine style. Mournin' is becomin',' says I, 'I'd like to wear it myself. It must be a great consolation to a widder. If you should die, Terry,' says I, 'I wouldn't spare the money on black stuff for you.'

"'You'd be glad enough for the chance,' says he, 'an' that stuck-up butler, too. Niver you let me hear you speak of him agin', or it's the four eyes of you both that I'll put in mournin',' says he.

"It was the butler, mum, that made the trouble betwixt us more than the mournin'. The misthress niver would have had a man in the house doin' a woman's work, but Mrs. Delacey she brought him from the city along with her new-fangled fashions, an' shure he needed more waitin' on than any of the aristocracy, orderin' round the other servants an' drivin' the cook wild wid the French dishes he was always a-suggestin'.

Digitized by Google

"But mind you, he didn't order me at all, at all. Quite contrairy, the villain; he was always blarney-in' me hair an' me eyes, an' sayin' as how he would like to see me in one of Mrs. Delacey's dresses, for he was sure I would be purtier in it than her leddyship herself. An' whither it was that he axed his misthress for me I don't know, but what did Mrs. Delacey do but give me one of her old black gowns.

As I entered the lodge.

"Now, though I was dyin' to see myself in it, I was that feared of Terry that I didn't dare put it on, until one day it happened that the masther sent him to the Park with one of the horses, an' he was to be gone three days, an', as good luck would have it, my third cousin's wife had just died, so av coorse I had the opportunity I wanted of wearin' the black dress to the funeral. Now whin we started for the buryin', who should I see at the door with the masther's trap but the butler.

"'An' will you ride with me, Ellen?' said he. 'Shure I've come all the way to take you, seein' I knew Terry was away,' says he.

"'Oh,' says I, 'I'm not goin' to the buryin',' says I, for I didn't like to ride with him at all, at all.

"'Thin let me take you home,' says he, 'for it's a good piece to the house, an' you're tired with footin' it here.'

"'I'll not be afther going home just yet,' says I. 'I'll stay wid the childer an' get supper against my cousin comes home from the cimetery,' says I, thinkin' that with that he would be off without me. But this was the very worst thing I could have done, for he just waited, the craythur, an' with the people bein' late back from the buryin', and insistin' that I should stay to supper, it was near dark whin I started for home. An' there was the butler a-waitin' for me, but I wouldn't ride with him, but just took my cousin's eldest boy for company, an' cut through the pine woods a short way. But, as bad luck would have it, I came out on the highway an' sent the boy back just afther the butler, who had driven round by the road an' had stopped at every public on the way, passed by, so that he drove through the lodge gate not two minutes before I came home, an' who should sit there but Terry, looking as black as a thunder-cloud.

"Well, I was surprised enough to see him, an' he saw it.

"'So I've caught you,' says he, 'you've been ridin' with the butler,' an' the more I denied it, the madder he got. 'An' what do you mane by dressin' yourself up like a widdy?' says he. 'If you want to be a widdy, it's not I that will be hinderin' you.'

"With that he took his hat, an' left the lodge. It had looked like rain all the day, an' there came on a fearful storm in the night, an' I dared not put foot outside the house, thinkin' he'd come back in the mornin'. But when two days went by, an' he niver came, the masther came to the lodge to see where he was, an' there was great huntin' an' searchin for him in all the neighbourhood. All we could find was that he had taken a little boat to row across the bay, an' most likely the squall had overturned it, for it was found floatin' far out, bottom upwards, but Terry or his body we never found.

"Thim were the sorrowfulest days o' my life, mum. The misthress was very kind to me, an' come often to see me, an' wanted me to stay all the time at the house, instead of spendin' my nights so lonely at the lodge. But I wouldn't do it, for I thought maybe Terry was not dead, after all, an' if he came back some avenin' he should find the windy lighted an' the supper waitin'.

"'My poor Ellen,' says the misthress, 'don't desave yourself, for he is dead for sure an' certain.'

"In my heart I was near belavin' her, but I kept up courage on the outside until the end of the summer, whin the family wint away to town, an' left the place all lonely for the winter. The butler called last of all, bringing with him a great bundle.

"'This came by parcel post for you from Lunnon,' says he.

"I cut the string, an' I saw it was a parcel of black gowns.

"'Whoiver sent these to me?' says I.

"'Belike it is Mrs. Delacey,' says the butler. 'She wint down to Lunnon a week ago,' says he.

"With that I burst out cryin', an' tied thim up again, an' tould him to carry thim back to his misthress.

"'You can't belave that Terry is still livin,' says he. 'An' you ought to do him the dacent thing by dressin' as a widdy ought. A great consolation you'll find it,' says he, 'an' I'll put a weed in my own hat to show my respect.'

"'An' how do I know that I am a widdy? Shure its not the likes of you, Dinnis O'Leary, that will make me belave he's dead,' says I.

"'Shure, who will you belave?' says he. 'It's not me alone, but the whole community says he's dead.'

"'I'll not belave anyone but Terry,' says I. 'Not till Terry himself tells me that he's dead will I belave myself a widdy.'

"'Shure, I niver before wished the appayrence of a ghost,' says the butler, 'but here's to the speedy comin' of the sperrit' Mrs. Terry, an' whin next summer comes, I thrust I may find you settin' your pretty cheeks off with a crape veil like a raysonable Christian resigned to the doin's of Providence.'

"With that he took himself and the bundle off, an' it was a long an' lonesome winter spent in the little lodge, with no neighbours but the dairyman and his family, who stayed to take care of the cows, for the other servants had gone to the city with the family. I earned some money helpin' make the butter, an' I was puttin' it by whin I heard that Terry's ould feyther and mither were to be sent to the poor-house, an' I had thim brought to the lodge, an' I nursed the old feyther to his grave, an' the old mither back to her health again.

"Thin the spring came, but I can't say that I was glad to see it, for I knew that the family would come back, an' the butler, an' that he would be afther botherin' me again. An' bother me he did, an' so did the whole parish, for first he sent a stone-cutter man to me to put up a gravestone to Terry, an' the praste himsel' tould me that I ought to be havin' prayers said to get him out of Purgatory, an' the inn-keeper brought me a bill that Terry had been runnin' up unbeknownst to me for whiskey, an' I saw that it began from the time that the butler came to the house, an' like as not it was of the throuble betwixt us.

"An' while I was castin' about in my mind which I should pay first, the inn-keeper or the praste, and how I should get the money to pay either, comes the butler again; an', 'Mrs. Terry,' says he, 'sure it's little we all see you care for your husband's mimory, or you wouldn't grudge him the bit crape that tells of mournin'. Thim that mourns shall be comforted, but maybe it's right you are, for faith Terry was not worth the grievin'.'

"With that I grew angry.

Digitized by Google

"'An', says I, 'it's none of your comfortin' I want in any case, Dinnis O'Leary, an' what nade have I to shpend on the mournin' whin my heart is in crape for him all the day long, an' it's better I should save his credit in this wurrld an' the nixt by payin' his debts an' the toll rates from Purgatory than shpendin' on my own dressin'.'

"With that the crayther saw that hope had wellnigh lift me, an', says he, 'What's the need of your slavin' in this way, Mrs. Terry? Terry had his life insured in your favour, an' there's a matter of a hundred and twenty pounds awaitin' your call, which will clear off all debts, an' lave you a rich widdy. An' what's the money got to do with your dressin', ayther? For here is this bundle of black dresses, which Mrs. Delacey did not send you at all, at all, for by the same token she knows nothin' about thim.'

"'Thin you bought thim yourself,' says I, 'an it's not I that will be afther acceptin' such a prisent from you.'

"But he denied it by all the saints, an' left the bundle in the door, an' I put it on the top shelf in the cupboard, I still mistrustin' that he had bought thim himsel', an' that the truth would out at last. Well, thin, I considered an' considered the matter of the insurance, but when I thought that if I had to shwear, as the butler said I must, to get the money, that to the best of my belafe an' wish that Terry was dead to all intints and purposes, dead for sure an' all, wid no hope of any resurrection, so far as this wurrld was concerned, it seemed to me that I was sellin' the bit of hope that I had lived all these months on, an' I couldn't do it.

"So, how I don't know, but that summer I lived through, an' a woeful one it was. I paid Terry's debts, an' I had the masses said, an' I was considerin' an illigant marble shtone for the buryin' ground, the which I meant to have earned to pay for by New Year's, for the misthress had lift me plenty of work to do.

"Whin a gurl in Ireland, the nuns had taught me to embroider an' to mark linen, an' the misthress had lift me a pile of sheets, an' pilly-cases, an' pleasant it was to sit by the foire wid the ould mither, an' think that with every letther I was makin' I was payin' for the cuttin' of another on Terry's tombstone. An' I determined not to stint the apytaph, but to give him a good long one, settin' down all his vartues, an' it should read somethin' like this:

"'HERE LIES THE BODY OF TERRY O'FLAHERTY.
WHICH IS NOT BURIED HERE, HAVIN' NIVER
BEEN FOUND, HE HAVIN' BEEN CAP-SIZED ONE DARK NIGHT IN A WHERRY.'

"(It was more like a dory, but I said 'wherry' for the poetry.)

"'He was the kindest an' best of husbands an' fellows, barrin' a bit quick-tempered an' a trifle jealous. His widdy erects this monyment as a New Year's prisent to testify her woe, an' that she will never belave him dead till he comes an' tells her so.'

"It was a beautiful idea, but I niver had the monyment put up, the raison bein' that one night, as I worked by the fire, an' the ould mither nodded in the chair, I see a face at the windy, an' I held out my arms at it, an' called 'Terry, Terry!' an' fainted away, an' whin I came to my right sinses, an' was wonderin' whether it was Terry's ghost come to tell me I was a widdy, I felt myself held in his two strong arms, an' by the same token I knew it was Terry himself.

"Drivin' the cook wild wid the French dishes.'

"Well, we laughed, an' we cried, an' we hugged each other, an' we went nearly crazy, an' he tould me how it was wild he was the night he went away, an' how he had rowed out to a sailing vessel that was bound for Calcutty by the way of the Cape of Good Hope, determined for to lave me free to be a widdy, if I loiked; but how that the ould love and the longin' were too strong for him intirely, an' he set out to come back again, but was detained by a matter of two or three shipwrecks, an' so he had not touched shore till that very mornin'.

"An' how all the way he had been tormented wid the fear that I might have belaved him dead, an' have married the butler, an' he had bethought him that he would look in at the windy, an' if he saw me dressed in black, he would belave me still a widdy, an' come; but whin he saw me in pink, it near took his sinses away, for he thought sure I had done mournin' for him, an' how he was about to turn away whin I saw him an' called him, an' thin come in he had to, right through the sash of the windy, even were it to murther the butler.

"'But how is it,' says Terry, 'that you've not been doin' me the respect of wearin' black for me as a widdy should, an' mournin' so becomin' to you?' says he.

"'Whisht, Terry,' says the ould mither, 'what money had she to buy mournin', whin she's been buryin' your feyther, an' payin' my docther, an' your bills, an' the praste for prayin' you out of Purgatory, let alone the illigant new tombstone she was preparin' for a New Year's prisent,' says she.

"'A New Year's prisent!' says Terry, 'an' I in such a hurry to come home that divil a bit of a prisent did I bring her but myself. Did you niver get the illigant gowns I sint you from Lunnon? The ship put in there before we set out on our voyage, an' I thought what a pleasure you would take intirely wid wearin' of the weeds.'

"'Oh, Terry!' says I, 'an' was it you that sint them? I thought they were from the butler, an' here they've been lyin' all the time, for niver a rag of them would I put on.'

"With that he had me put on one of the dresses, an' he said it was too bad I should have deprived myself of one of the privileges of my widdyhood whin I had the chance, especially as he was now convinced that this was the only privilege I cared for, an' now his comin' home must not be a hindrance to my pleasure, an' I must wear them for his sake, as they were the only New Year's prisent he had for me.

"An' when I came to consider, it seemed only right an' proper I should do so, for shure no man deserved more to be mourned for, an' here was a matter of nearly two years, when I ought to have mourned for him, that I didn't, an' shure hadn't I given my word to the butler that I would wear mournin' for Terry, when Terry came back an' tould me to?

"So that is the explanation of the whole conundrum, an' you may ask Terry himself if it isn't a merry mournin' to him as well as to me."

"Shure, mum, it's that same," said Terence O'Flaherty; and the coachman, who had lounged into the lodge in time to hear the last part of the recital, took his little wife upon his knee, and, imprinting a rousing smack on her rosy cheek, added: "an' it's not permitted to every man to have the pleasure of consolin' his own widdy."

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS' TREASURE

SUMMARY.

The mail train has been robbed between Cornwall and La Grange stations, and £20,000 worth of gold stolen by a gang of desperadoes, headed by two brothers named Mulligan. Two passengers on the train—Adolph Squirrek, alias Smith, a detective tracking the Mulligans, and Fred Weldon, a young lawyer—who have struck up an acquaintance on the way, alight at Somerville, where the former stopped at the "Drover," and the latter at his mother's house. During the night a message comes to say that Judge Woodland's horse has come back alone, and Weldon, together with Squirrek and two other men set out to find him, and discover one of Mulligan's confederates lying senseless on the road. The man, who had made an unsuccessful attempt on the life of the judge, is sentenced to forty years' imprisonment. At Judge Woodland's Weldon meets a Spaniard named Alvarido Almanaz, and the two men become rivals for the love of Florence, the judge's daughter. Weldon is inveigled to a lonely bridge near Cornwall, and disappears. Squirrek pays a fruitless visit to the spot. Squirrek arouses the citizens of Cornwall, who make their way to the outlaws' hiding-place. One outlaw is found and killed, and the cabin is set fire to. Squirrek discovers a scrap of paper with the following cryptogram: "1——0——1. Cfujk't Bsdfj 50zct Mpqug Vmeds sid X gjsf Nbg." He afterwards falls in with the two remaining outlaws and has them arrested.

CHAPTER XX.

LYNCHED!

THE succeeding day was passed without any incident worthy of note, the greater portion of it being spent by me in endeavouring to decipher the writing in my possession. But it was as great a puzzle to me as to Señor Almanaz, and the result of my study was the conviction that I never could be able to fathom its mystery without the help of some one.

In moving through the town during the afternoon I made a rather startling discovery. A plan was brewing, and, in fact, was already perfected, which looked like summary justice being visited upon the heads of the Mulligans. The mayor had only succeeded in lulling the storm—he had not subdued it.

Over a hundred men—numbering the most respectable, and at the same time the most determined people in Somerville—had organised and banded together for the sworn purpose of lynching the prisoners.

Just at dusk I hurried to the mayor's office. He knew of what was going on.

"There is only one way I can stop it," said he.

"What's that?"

"Run them off in the train to the State prison at Alton, where they can be temporarily confined until this danger passes over. All the mobs in the United States couldn't hurt that building."

"But that is fifty miles distant."

"I know it. The express will be along in half an hour; the station-master will be ready. We can slip the two men out the back way, and have them twenty miles out of the town before anyone, except our friends, can suspect what has been done."

"I hope the plan will succeed."

"So do I," said the mayor, rapping his stick on the floor very earnestly. "These lynchings are becoming too common in the West. I confess I have sometimes had some sympathy for the community who have taken the law into their own hands, when the legal authorities were powerless. The Vigilance Committee of San Francisco, a dozen years ago, did a good work, but there is no need for anything of the kind here These men have enjoyed a great immunity heretofore, but it is at end now."

While I, in common with the magistrate, had a great desire to see the majesty of the law sustained. I still felt, what I suspected him of feeling, some sympathy for the multitude that had borne much great wrong. The mayor knew that I was a detective, but had not known that I had headed the crowd that went out of Cornwall a few days before, and visited the island, and I did not think it necessary to tell him.

It was about seven o'clock in the evening that a close carriage drove rapidly from the rear of the gaol towards the station, starting the very instant the whistle of the express train was heard.

The Mulligans were hurried into the train, and followed by four officers and myself. Our exit had attracted no attention, and we felicited ourselves upon the neat manner in which we had outwitted the people, and laughed over the chagrin that they would feel when the trick was discovered.

Our plan was a good one, but we were betrayed, and I am satisfied that one of the police officers accompanying us was the man who did it.

Just as we were nearing Cornwall, and had begun to slacken, the conductor jerked the signal rope for the engine to go through without stopping. He instantly blew the whistle for the loosening of the brakes, and the engine made a leap forward, puffing louder and faster, but in the next ten seconds the whistle was blown again—the signal for the putting on of the brakes being twice repeated—an indication that there was danger ahead—and we began rapidly pulling up.

The crowd greeted me with a cheer.

I arose from my seat and looked out of the window. By the lamps at the station a vast swarming crowd of people could be seen, all swayed by some great, controlling excitement.

I suspected the truth at once, and so did my companions and the prisoners, who turned pale and looked at one another, but did not speak a word. A moment later Jim said:

Digitized by Google

They struggled and fought like wild beasts.

"Just loose our hands and give us a show, won't you?"

The officer shook his head.

"It won't do any good; we'll protect you as well as we can."

"Yes; we know what that will amount to," replied the other, with a sneer. "I believe this is some of your work."

The officer leant forward, and hastily unlocked the handcuffs upon the wrists of the prisoners.

At this moment several men entered the car, looked eagerly round for an instant, and then walked towards us. At their head was Lieutenant Belknap. As I resumed my ministerial disguise, he recognised me by a nod.

"I believe these are the men we want," said he, looking sharply at the prisoners.

"Lieutenant," said I, "there is no necessity for this. You know me well enough to believe that I have no wish to befriend these men. But there has been enough of this lynching business; we have them securely guarded, and they cannot escape punishment this time."

"I don't think they can either," was the significant reply. "There is no need of your talking to me, captain; if you want to preach go outside and talk to them."

The crowd was surging and pressing against the windows, struggling with each other to get a sight of the criminals, and demanding that they should be brought out.

It was a critical moment, and I pressed my way outside. As soon as I was seen the crowd recognised me and greeted me with a cheer. Encouraged by this mark of friendship, I mounted the railing at the end of the car, took off my hat, and signified that I wished to address them. Instantly all was still.

"My friends," I called out, in the most impressive voice I could use, "have I not demonstrated to you that I am your friend, and the foe of this gang of desperadoes?"

Tremendous cheers and affirmative responses followed this.

"Well, then, I want you to prove yourselves my friends. We have the last of the Mulligan gang—the two leaders themselves—in secure custody, and in the next hour we intend to have them securely lodged in the State Prison, from which they will never come, except to be remanded back again for the whole term of their natural lives. I can sympathise with you in your exasperation at the long immunity these men have been allowed. But that is now at an end. The gang is extirpated, and there is no call for your taking these two miserable wretches in hand. If I thought there was the least chance of their escaping, I would be the first to demand their summary execution. But they are anxious to get into prison, and you may be sure they will be securely guarded there.

"The news of our doings for the last few days has been telegraphed all over the union, and published in all the papers, and we have been sneered at as a half-civilised community. Let us prove that we never take the law into our own hands except when justice calls us to do so. Disperse like good citizens——"

But I was talking to madmen, and they would hear me no longer. I was interrupted by hootings, and the next moment Lieutenant Belknap and his companions emerged from the train, dragging the Mulligan brothers after them. They struggled and fought like wild beasts, but their ankles were bound together, and, although their arms were free, yet they were powerless to inflict any injury. Lieutenant Belknap and one or two of his comrades handled the men like so many puppets.

Some one had telegraphed to Brampton, apprising the Vigilance Committee of the intended removal of the prisoners, and this explained the gathering.

The officers had made a feeble attempt to protect their charge, but there was little trouble in overcoming them, and they abandoned them into the hands of the mob, who were roused up to a fiendish excitement.

There is no need of describing the scene that followed. The men were given ten minutes in which to make their peace with Heaven, but they sullenly refused to take it, and then a rush was made for the nearest tree.

Shortly afterwards, they were dangling between heaven and earth, the crowd hooting and exulting in their death-throes, the streets lit up with lamps and torches, which made the faces of the multitude look garish and unearthly in the light, while the people swarming back and forth—savage and vengeful as they always are made by such scenes—were forbidding and dangerous in the extreme. Like the fanatics in the French

Shortly afterwards they were dangling between heaven and earth.

Digitized by Google

Revolution, they were ready to turn against their friends upon the slightest pretext.

Before swinging the two miserable men off into eternity they were asked to tell what had become of Frederick Weldon; but as they knew nothing was to be gained they kept silent, and the secret perished with them.

I left the train at Cornwall, as there was no call for my going further. I had seen the last of the famous Mulligan Gang, which had infested this portion of the West for a number of years, and the only survivor was "poor Tom Borie," who was in the State penitentiary for twenty years.

I received my large reward for the apprehension of the leaders, and my work with them was finished.

But a more important work lies before me—the solving of the mystery of Frederick Weldon's disappearance, and, after that, the solution of the cipher which I found upon the island, and which I still have in my possession.

And laying down my pen for a time, I now turn to the unravelling of the most singular web of fate which ever came under my observation.

CHAPTER XXI.

TWO PEOPLE HAVE STRANGE DREAMS.

ADOLPH SQUIRREK, the detective, having laid aside his pen for a time, the historian now takes it up.

After the tempest came the lull. There were preliminaries of legal proceedings against the men who had rescued the Mulligans from the officers and lynched them; but the sentiment of the community was so strongly adverse that the step never amounted to anything.

Men plunged anew into the business of life, and almost ceased to talk of the whirlwind of passion that had swept over them a short time before. It was a thing of the past, and the country could never be similarly cursed again.

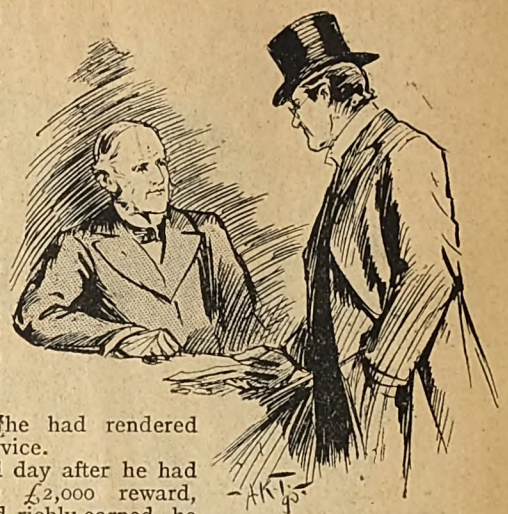
Upon one hearthstone the shadow had fallen. Weldon's mother was stricken to the earth by the loss of her son, and the sympathy of the whole town was with her. She was visited and condoled with by scores, for all knew what a noble child she had lost.

Florence Woodland scarcely let an afternoon pass that she did not sit beside the old lady, and talk with her regarding her boy. She added to the partial parent's encomiums, and did everything in her power to cheer her in her great sorrow. Many little delicacies found their way to her table from the well-stocked larder of Judge Woodland, and in the church, of which she had so many years been a prominent member, she was the burden of prayer and the most tender solicitation.

All that could be done to lighten her sorrow was done, and the innumerable acts of kindness were appreciated by the gentle soul, whose only wish now was to pass quietly down the vale of life, and in the good time of Providence, join her husband and son, who, she felt had preceded her by only a few years to the better land.

Did everything in her power to cheer her in her great sorrow.

ADOLPH SQUIRREK, the detective, performed an act which did his heart credit, and increased the respect in which he was held in the neighbourhood where he had rendered such good service.



Called upon Judge Woodland.

The second day after he had received the £2,000 reward, which he had richly earned, he called upon Judge Woodland, and stated to him that he wished to place the whole amount in his hands for the sole benefit of the widow Weldon.

Seeing the look of surprise upon the old lawyer's face, he said, somewhat impatiently:

"It is hers; it will serve partly to compensate her for the loss of her son. I led him into this business, with the promise of half the profits, and I could never retain a penny of it without feeling that there was blood upon it."

The papers were duly made out, and the noble act of charity performed, after which the detective seemed to breathe more freely. Then Judge Woodland turned to him, and asked abruptly:

"Do you think Frederick Weldon is dead?"

The officer was silent a moment, as though debating with himself.

"No; I believe he is alive."

"What reason have you for thinking so?"

"I cannot explain at present. A few days ago I was certain he still walked the earth; now I only suspect it, but I shall never rest until I have penetrated the mystery regarding him.

"If alive, why is he absent?"

"That is for me to discover."

"Have you acquainted his mother with your belief?"

"No; there is no reason to raise a hope which may only be cruelly disappointed. The whole thing will be settled within a few weeks, one way or another."

"I pray you may be rewarded with success, but I have not the slightest hope that you will."

"I do not expect you to believe it; I only ask that what I have said to you shall be known to no one else."

The judge inclined his head to signify that his promise was given. Then followed a few second's silence, when the detective added:

"I am a plain man, judge, and you will not take offence, therefore, at what I am about to say?"

"I know you too well not to understand you."

"You have quite a frequent visitor to your house in the person of the Cuban Almanaz."

"He calls occasionally."

"Receive him with caution, and do not let him become too warm a friend in your family. You understand me?"

"I beg your pardon, I do not."

"Then let it pass," replied Squirrek, somewhat testily.

"Please explain yourself."

"I have given you my word of warning; that ought to be sufficient. If it isn't, don't blame me."

The judge pressed the detective for a further explanation of what he had said; but he steadily refused, feeling that the arrow which he had aimed had been sent home.

A few moments later he bade his host good-evening, and withdrew. The judge called the next day at the hotel to see his friend, but was told that he had left with his luggage by the late train on the preceding evening, and he did not suppose he intended returning again, unless—as the fellow facetiously remarked—a new set of Mulligan brothers should spring up, when, he had no doubt, he would be on hand again.

Digitized by Google

The following morning there was a look of dejection upon the face of Judge Woodland, as he took his seat at the breakfast table, which occasioned the anxious inquiry of his daughter.

"I had a curious dream last night," said he.

"But you don't believe in dreams, father?"

"Of course not; but this was so strange, so vivid that I cannot get it out of my head. It awoke me in the night, and made me uneasy, and then when I dropped asleep I had the same vision directly over again."

"What was it about?"

"Fred Weldon."

Florence started and turned slightly pale, which the parent did not notice.

"I suppose it came from what Smith said last evening——"

"Was he here?" interrupted his daughter.

"Yes; did you not know it?" returned the parent looking up with some surprise. "He was here only a few minutes, and naturally we fell to speaking of young Weldon and his curious fate, and I suppose the thoughts came to the surface again when I was unconscious."

"But I haven't heard your dream."

"I thought it was a clear, moonlight night, and I saw a young man walk rapidly along the railroad from Brampton towards the High Bridge, which you know is over that little stream that is called Devil's Creek. One look at him showed that it was Fred Weldon, and that he was hurrying over the railway as though he were late in keeping some appointment. I saw his face as plainly as I see yours this instant, and noticed that it appeared pale in the moonlight.

"I watched him until he had reached the High Bridge, and then I noticed that he was walking between two men, who had come up beside him like phantoms, although where from it was impossible to imagine. You know, my dear, that the sensation of wonder is never experienced in dreams. No matter how absurd and grotesque everything is, yet in dreamland we always take it as a matter of course.

"While I was looking at the trio they vanished so suddenly out of sight that I was convinced they had fallen through the bridge into the stream below.

"There was nothing extraordinary in such a dream as this, except in its being repeated with a vividness that awoke me with a start, and found me shuddering all over. I slept no more, and found it impossible to get it out of my head.

"Now," continued the judge, in his oracular way, "had I been indulging in a more substantial dinner than usual, had been unwell, or had any remarkable circumstance happened to me yesterday, I could reasonably account for this curious freak of sleep. However, I am so firmly convinced of the meaningless nature of dreams, that the most that I can say is, that this was curious."

There was a look of dejection on the face of Judge Woodland.

There was a silence for a few minutes, during which Florence displayed some emotion, broken finally by her remark:

"I had a dream also."

"Very natural."

"But this was something like yours."

"Ah! about Fred Weldon?" asked the judge eagerly, looking at her in surprise.

Carrying a third with them.

"Yes; about him."

"What was it?"

"It seems to me rather like a continuation of your dream. I know the vicinity of the High Bridge and the stream very well, for we frequently went nutting there when I was a child, and I remember the old chestnut which Fred Weldon used to climb to the very top, and whip the branches off for us.

"Well, I saw three men walking through that ravine. Two of them were bending down and carrying a third with them, and as the moon shone on the face of this man, I saw that it was Fred Weldon's, pale, with the eyes shut, and there was blood on the forehead. Oh, it was terrible!" exclaimed the girl, shuddering and placing her hands over her face, as if to shut out the sight.

"Strange!" remarked the judge, in an undertone, as if speaking to himself, but looking perplexedly at his daughter.

The latter overcame her emotion in a few moments, and then said:

"One of the men carrying him was tall, and his back was towards me, so that I could not see his face, but I knew it was the Cuban, Almanaz——"

"There, by heaven!" exclaimed the old man, slamming his teacup down upon the table, "that's just what I saw, but I didn't think it was worth while to say it!"

Both were so agitated that they ate no more at the breakfast table. They tarried long, discussing their dreams, but the father said nothing of the hope that had been awakened in his breast, less by these dreams than by the words the detective had uttered (taken in conjunction with them) the night before.

The same hope fluttered in the breast of Florence Woodland like the struggles of a dying dove, but she gave it no expression. She felt a longing to see the clear-headed "Mr. Smith," who had called there several times, for it seemed to her that he could help her in her distressful quandary.

CHAPTER XXII.

ANOTHER DREAM, AND SEÑOR ALMANAZ SAYS GOOD-BYE.

WHEN Señor Almanaz was announced at the door in the afternoon, Florence Woodland sent word that she could not see him. A half-hour later she stole quietly out and made her way to the residence of Mrs. Weldon.

The old lady was always glad to see her, but especially on this occasion.

"For I dreamt of Fred last night," she said.

Florence started, as if to make certain that she was not in a dream herself.

"Was it good or bad?" she asked, to divert attention from her own nervousness.

"Both; good because it seemed to say that he was not dead, and bad because he was so ill."

"Pray tell me all about it."

Digitized by Google

"I saw him riding through the dark streets of a city in a close carriage, with a man on either side of him. They looked savagely and unfeelingly at him in his distress——"

"Describe the men."

"One was short, with red hair and sandy whiskers all over his face; the other was tall, with black, curly hair, black eyes, dark face and moustache——"

"There, that will do," interrupted Florence, who recognised the Cuban in this succinct description. "Tell me the rest of your dream."

"I saw him in a low, dirty room, with a doctor bending over him, looking, oh! so pale and ill that I felt like rushing to him. Can it be—can it be that my dear Fred is alive?" moaned the mother, walking the floor in her anguish

"Calm yourself," pleaded the girl, who was scarcely less agitated. "If he is alive he will come back to you"

"You know his body has never been found," she said, turning her tearful face to her visitor. "If he is alive, he is ill, and I cannot go to him."

"He will be found if living."

"Who will find him?" demanded the parent, stopping suddenly in her walk, and looking sorrowfully at her young friend.

"Mr. Smith will never give up searching for him until he learns that he is either dead or until he finds him."

"How do you know that?"

"I know he will find him," was the vehement reply. "Has he not shown the greatest interest in Fred? Will he not be the most likely to know something about him? He has left Somerville now, and I am sure it is to find out all he can about your poor boy."

Florence regretted that she had spoken these words, for they harrowed the mother to the very soul. But they could not be recalled, and she could only pray that they might eventuate in something good to her.

She did her utmost to soothe and quiet her, and had measurably succeeded when she left the house and started homeward.

The day was just ending when she left the village to walk the short distance that intervened between that and her home; but she had gone but a few yards when she heard quickening footsteps behind her, and a moment later Señor Almanaz was at her side.

It was the same figure that she had seen in her dream.

The Spaniard gracefully lifted his hat, and spoke in the pure English for which he was noted.

"I am glad you have so far recovered as to be able to take an afternoon stroll."

"I feel quite well."

"I was sorry that I was not able to see you this afternoon, as I am about to leave Somerville."

"For good?"

"Yes. I return to Cuba from which beautiful isle I have been absent too long."

"When do you go?"

"To-morrow morning."

"Ah, that is soon."

Florence was swayed by such a shuddering disgust for the man at her side that she could not utter any hypocritical regrets at his intended departure. She was too much relieved at the thought to allow her to do any such thing. For while the Cuban walked beside her she saw another shadowy form bending over the prostrate figure of the widow's son.

They conversed in a rambling manner until they reached a gate of the lane leading into her father's home. At this point the Cuban hastened forward to unfasten the gate for her and, on acccunt of his tall figure, he was compelled to stoop somewhat in order to do so.

At that instant Florence uttered a slight scream, and covered her face with her hands.

"What is the matter?" he asked, hastening to her side.

"Nothing," she replied; "it has passed over."

As the dark evil-looking man bent over to take the gate fastening, it was the same figure that she had seen in her dream, and she could not avoid the faint gasping scream that escaped her at the startling repetition.

The two walked in silence up the lane until they reached the gate, which opened into the yard of the house. This was drawn open by the señor, who waited for her to pass in.

She did so, and he lingered, wishing to enter, and yet waiting for the invitation, which did not come. Looking him fully in the face, Florence said in her quiet manner:

"Good evening, Señor Almanaz."

"Miss Woodland—Florence, I do not understand what this means."

"It means simply that I cannot see you again. I wish you a pleasant voyage to your home again. Good evening."

She bowed low, turned about, and walked into the house, without uttering another word, or once looking back.

Señor Alvarido Almanaz gazed after her for a few minutes, like one transfixed. He seemed unable to comprehend what had passed. Then, as it all came over him, he turned on his heel, and walked rapidly away.

Florence Woodland walked silently into the house, and went to her room. At the tea table her father was reserved and silent, and acted in a manner which showed that something troubled him.

When the meal was finished it came out.

"It was singular, Florence, that Almanaz should have figured in both our dreams; don't you think so?"

"I do."

"And in both so unfavourably?"

"It does seem strange."

Silence followed for a few moments, and then the father said:

"I confess I do not like him. I always had a good opinion of him, and I cannot call to mind anything that he has ever said or done that was not what it should be."

Just then Judge Woodland was not thinking of his dream, but of the words that the detective had spoken on the preceding evening.

"I do not like him. He told me a short time ago that he was to sail for Cuba to-morrow——"

"I am glad of it."

"And he bade me good-bye."

"I am glad to hear that also."

"And I was unspeakably relieved to be well rid of him."

"And that makes me more pleased than all," said the father, as he rose from his seat and kissed the forehead of his daughter.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

I HAD joined a party in the hope of a few days' sport among the hills near Amulpore, and found my host a most agreeable companion. We had many tastes in common, and found pleasant topics for conversation as we sat smoking our cheroots on the broad verandah. One evening I was sitting alone.

Where he came from I cannot tell, but all at once, through the faint blue smoke of my cheroot, appeared a little withered fakir, peering at me from under the loose folds of his dirty turban. His skinny brown body was naked, save for the presence of a piece of tiger-skin wrapped about his loins, and a belt that ran across his body from shoulder to waist. He was muttering to himself, but the only words that I could catch were "Brahma, Brahma, Radhe-fusee."

Surprise made me speechless. I simply stared at the wizened face and glittering black eyes, wondering what he was going to do. The sound of the swinging purdah told of Walworth's approach.

"Did you think that I had forsaken you?" he said lightly; "Thura's interviews are interminable. He is as long-winded as a tipsy Irishman."

I half turned towards him while he was speaking. As he came round and resumed his chair, I said, in an undertone: "What do you think of this fossil?"

"What fossil?" he asked.

"The one before us," I replied, turning and looking at the place where the fakir had stood. No fakir was there. On the gravel walk lay a half-coiled cobra. Walworth started to his feet and called for Marja to bring him a gun. The cobra lay quiet for a moment, as if in contemplation of the situation, then, at the sound of approaching feet, with slow and graceful movement and erect head, slid across the sodden grass and disappeared through an opening under the verandah.

"Rather dangerous fossil," said Walworth, eyeing me curiously: "the men must keep a watch for him. You are a cool one, I must confess, my lad."

"I was not alluding to the snake," replied I: "It had reference to the fakir. I wonder what became of the poor wretch. The cobra frightened him away, I suppose. What are you about?" I continued, seeing Marja coming from the bungalow with a slender reed pipe in one hand and a chafing dish, on which burnt an odorous, smoking fire in the other.

"A charm for his snakeship," said my host laughing. "A cloud of aromatic incense and a serenade on the toumril."

But neither the incense nor the seductive strains of the toumril were sufficiently potent to call the cobra from his covert.

"That no time cobra," said Marja. "Sahib saw fakir, but all at once no fakir, only snake. Marja knows."

His tones were mysterious. I smiled and looked at his master. "A metamorphosis, eh?" Walworth nodded. "A clear case of Theosophy," I continued. Walworth looked grave. He dismissed the servant with a wave of his hand, threw away his cigar, shifted his position slightly, and arranged himself more comfortably in his chair.

"You are sceptical," he said. "Listen to what I have to tell you; perhaps then you will believe.

"I was a much younger man than you when I came to India. I was surgeon of the Fusiliers. Shortly after we were stationed at the fort I was invited to an entertainment given by a native nobleman at his palace in the city. The scene reminded me of the 'Arabian Nights.' Oriental magnificence was mingled with European elegance. We were received in an open court-yard, spread with cream-coloured Yac rugs, in the centre of which a fountain played in a white marble basin, cooling the air with its perfumed spray. I halted at the upper step of the stairway, and stood leaning with one hand on the broad railing watching the kaleidoscopic scene before me.

"Our colonel and his wife stopped a moment to speak to me. As they turned to go Mrs. Beldon's name was called, and, a little lower down, was a young girl. I thought I had never seen one so beautiful.

"She was dark, but her skin was a pale, transparent brown, flushed with the crimson of a rose leaf. Her lips were carmine, opening, as she smiled, over teeth as white as pearls. Her soft, lustreless black hair was drawn up from her temples and caught back by a comb of gold and filigree. Her eyes were dark, soft and velvety.

"'So you were going to pass me unnoticed!' she said, in the sweetest voice possible.

"'Why, Naida! what are you doing here alone? When did you return?'

"'To-day. I am not alone. Papa is over there, speaking to General Monckton. Isn't this the loveliest fête?'

"I was duly presented to Miss Howe.

"To make a long story short, I called on her, fell in love with her, proposed to and married her.

"Her father was an Englishman, a judge on a Northern circuit; her mother, some said, was a Spaniard, others said she was an Italian Begum. Little cared I what the mother was, I loved her as my very soul.

"The first month of my married life was passed in unalloyed happiness. All the hours were golden hours. The Paradise lost to old Father Adam seemed restored to me. But by-and-bye, a cloud no bigger than a man's hand appeared on the horizon. I observed a change in Naida. She was alternately very quiet and very restless. She was nervous and out of sorts. She would start and shiver when the clock chimed, or murmur blankly and shudder if a door slammed.

"'What is it, Naida?' I asked one day. 'You are not yourself. What is the matter with you?'

"She glanced wearily at me. 'I hardly know. I am afraid I am a little homesick. I think I want Gurgah.'

"'Who is Gurgah?'

"'My ayah.'

"'You shall have Gurgah. Why didn't you speak of her before?'

"The next day I found a small, dark woman, in a snowy garment, with a grave countenance enlivened by a nose-ring and ear-plates, squatting on the floor beside Naida's hammock. It was the ayah. Days of sunshine followed. My wife chattered and laughed to her heart's content. Poor child! she was homesick.

"I was waiting in my gharry one evening for a friend who was to drive with me to an outpost a few miles from the station. As I entered his compound I noticed a bevy of ladies at chotah-hazree on the verandah Not in a mood to join them I drew up under a tree and sent my boy to the house. I was sufficiently near to hear their voices, and the conversation was distinctly audible above the clatter of silver and china. As a matter-of-fact, uninterested Benedict, I paid no attention to their chatter, until I heard a voice, rendered shrill by surprise, exclaim:

"'Naida Howe married! Good Gracious! Who is the unfortunate man? He must have been either a stranger or a lunatic. What did you all mean by permitting him to marry her? Was no one kind enough to warn the poor fellow?'

Digitized by Google

"What on earth did the woman mean? I strained my ears to catch the reply.

"'A warning would have done him no good. He was the most infatuated man I ever saw. Love wrapped him as with a garment. And, besides, it never does to burn one's fingers with other people's fires. I daresay they will get along; Naida is very peculiar, but she is a very sweet girl.'

"'Peculiar! I should say so——' At that moment Kirk came out and we drove away. All the evening the echo of those dreadful words rang in my ears. What did it all mean?

"I reached home with a strange foreboding of evil. I felt heavy and oppressed It was so still you might have fancied that death filled the place. By the shining panels on the wall hard by the bay window, I caught sight of a jewelled hand toying with the folds of the curtain. The red glint of the gems sparkled on the dusky skin. I called her name softly, 'Naida!'

"'Ah.'

"She rose and pushed the curtain aside and came languidly towards me. There was a peculiar expression in her eyes. She stared at me for a second time, and then, before I could say a word, glided from the room. Her handkerchief had fallen. I raised it from the floor; a faint subtle odour emanated from its folds. I cast it from me—I can't tell why—and crossed over to the window.

"The punkah boy was asleep on the grass, with my Irish setter beside him. I was about to call and rouse him, when out into the moonlight from the black shade of a clump of caladiums sprang the slight, graceful form of an animal. It streaked across the ground in sinuous track; the moon showed its tawny yellow hide spotted with brown. It was a cheetah.

"Alarmed for the boy, I jumped through the window and, catching him by the shoulder, dragged him to his feet. His teeth chattered and his dark face grew livid.

"'The cheetah, sahib! That cheetah has been running about the bungalow nearly all week.'

"I sent immediately for the men servants of the establishment and set them as guard over the bungalow: then I went to seek Naida.

"I called her name softly, not wishing to alarm her, but no answer came to my tender call. I opened the door. A pale blue light burnt in a silver sconce that hung on the wall. The moonbeams fell in through the open window and mingled with the light of the lamp. A faint white smoke hung over the further corner of the room. I looked at the couch—it was empty. I glanced about the room—no one was there. Where were they—Naida and her nurse? Could they be out on the lawn? Already I fancied the murderous teeth and talons of the cheetah tearing the delicate flesh of my darling. Perhaps at that moment he was sucking her life-blood. I rushed out of the bungalow shouting her name—'Naida! Naida! Naida!'

"Followed by half-a-dozen natives, I hurried over the compound, but we saw neither wife nor ayah. Nearly frantic, I was returning to the house. In front of the bungalow I saw a white object—it was the nurse.

"Where is your missy?" I cried, grasping her arm.

"She rested her glistening eyes on my face while she deliberately answered:

"'Missy in the bungalow, in her own room.'

"'The cheetah! the cheetah!' cried the men behind me.

"'Where?' I called excitedly.

"'There, on lawn, close by bungalow!'

"A wild yell and the scream, 'He jumped in missy window! he jump in missy window!'

"In an instant I was at Naida's door. I flung it open. No cheetah was to be seen; but on the foot of the couch sat my wife, gasping breathlessly and staring wildly about her.

"'Darling,' I cried, 'where have you been? Are you hurt? Where is the cheetah?'

"She answered me by bursting into tears on my shoulder. I let her weep unreservedly while I caressed her beautiful hair. Presently I raised her head, and, holding her face between my hands, looked into her eyes. Their expression baffled me. She put out her hands and pushed me from her.

"'Where is Gurgah?' she said, in a husky whisper.

"Some one was already bending over her. The ayah's thin arms lifted her up and carried her to her bed-chamber. I heard her scream aloud and beat her hands upon the wall.

"Was she mad? The fearful thought darted like lightning through my brain. I went to the door and looked in. Her eyes were roaming here and there about the room. Gurgah was leaning over her, chafing her hands and crooning a low, soothing song. My presence seemed to irritate her; she turned away when she met my gaze, buried her head in the pillow, and lay there with her face downwards. I did not want to torture her. I went to my own room.

"In the morning, to my great surprise, I found her on the verandah. No sign of last night's excitement was visible. She was endeavouring to make Taio, her pug, sit erect and hold a bit of biscuit on his nose.

"'I am putting the stupid fellow through a course of training,' she cried gaily, as I came upon the scene. Her voice was sweet and clear, and told of no pain or distress. She arose from her stooping posture, thrust her arm in through mine, and said:

"'Let's take a walk through the compound, dearest. I want to hear the birds sing before breakfast. I wonder,' she went on, as we walked along under the palm shade, 'if you are my soul's affinity?'

"'Of course,' I replied. 'We would not have fallen in love so soon and married, if an affinity had not existed between us.'

"'You do not quite understand me. I mean celestial affinity—a bond that will last beyond time.'

"Her look wandered off into space.

"'John,' she said, 'do you believe in the progress of souls?'

"'I have never given the subject a thought, so I cannot say. I believe in the progress of bodies,' I replied lightly.

"'You have more faith in materialism than in spirituality,' she continued gravely. 'You should study, John.'

"I smiled. 'Wisdom thy name is Naida! My dear, whence comes all this learning—is Gurgah the deep well from which you draw? You are too much for me, little woman.'

"I plucked a rose from the bush that we were passing and playfully tipped her on the chin with it. 'See, there is Schinasawing; they want us in the breakfast-room. Come, let us go and see what the cook has provided.'

"The following week was one of tumult and commotion. The entire station was aroused. A cheetah was making the rounds of the compounds, and more than one person was terrified by the sight of the tawny beast creeping stealthily about their premises. Major Dent surprised it asleep in the forks of a toddy-tree at the back of the hospital, but before he could secure a weapon the animal managed to escape. Naughty children required no fictitious bugbear to terrify them into good behaviour now; the very name of this notorious visitor subdued the little culprits to prompt obedience and abject penitence. At night all bungalows were closed.

"Recollecting Naida's terror the night of the cheetah's visit to us, I forbade the subject to be mentioned in her presence, and, unknown to her, I provided weapons for the men-servants, and kept constant guard on the bungalow.

"Late one night, as I was returning from a visit to a sick man at the hospital, I descried lights flitting about my compound. Excited shouts issued from the shrubbery, and the loud yelping of hounds filled the air.

"Gurgah sprang to meet me as I leapt from my gharry.

"'Oh, sahib,' she cried; grasping my arm in mad eagerness, 'the cheetah is out! Call off the men! They will kill it!'

"'That's what I want them to do,' I returned, hastily breaking from her grasp. I ran hurriedly in the direction of the melée, closely followed by Gurgah.

"'Where is it, Schinasawing?' I called.

"'In the pecpul copse, sahib.'

"There was the simultaneous crack of a dozen rifles, and a loud, wild wail from the ayah.

"All rushed forward to the thicket. With a cry of consternation the men fell back. There upon the earth, riddled with bullets, bleeding and dying, lay—Naida!"

Digitized by Google

A FATHER'S FORETHOUGHT

CHAPTER I.

THERE was once a time, according to some of our old codes of laws, when a girl's dowry consisted only of a wreath of roses. It is no longer the case now. To-day the question of the dowry is the most important one of the marriage, and causes in various families many funny, sad and touching scenes. It is one of these family scenes that I want to tell you about.

Let us enter into the house of M. Desgranges, an old retired merchant, who lived at Villeneuve Saint Georges, a little town a short distance south of Paris. His daughter Madeleine had been asked in marriage by a young architect, and the two young people were desperately in love with each other.

M. Grandval, however, the young man's father, would not allow his son to marry anyone who had not a dowry of 200,000 francs, and M. Desgranges would only give his daughter 100,000. His wife urged him to give the amount needed; his daughter implored him; but he remained inflexible. Madame Desgranges belonged to that class of soft-hearted mothers who cannot speak of their daughters without tears in their eyes, so she begged and insisted, until at last, seeing that she made no impression on her husband, she rose and said with indignation:

"M. Desgranges, do you wish to know what I think of you? I think you are a man devoid of heart and feeling."

"I know it, my dear."

"You are not a father, you are a——"

"An executioner," he supplied theatrically.

"Do you know, Monsieur Desgranges, that you will soon succeed in making me crazy, in making me lose my temper entirely!"

"Dear mother, enough, enough!" said Madeleine, rising from her seat. "I do not wish to be the cause of any disagreement between you and my father, and since he does not wish to grant our request, since he refuses to do what we are so anxious for, that which would make the happiness of Henri and myself——" She stopped and burst into tears.

"She weeps!" cried Madame Desgranges. "Oh, my daughter! My dear little daughter! Does not even this move you, monster? Can you see her tears, and hear her say in her gentle voice that you could make her happy, and remain obdurate?"

"What do you expect, my dear?" said her husband. "Whenever I see a woman in tears, I am on my guard."

"What do you mean?"

"It is not my fault, I can assure you," said he. "When we were first married, you wept so often, when you wanted me to do anything for you, that women's tears now always have the effect of making me obstinate."

"Oh! father, father!" cried Madeleine, "can you doubt the sincerity of my grief? Do you not believe that I love Henri? He is so good and sensible, and you say yourself that his prospects as an architect are very good."

"That is all true."

"Yes, well then," interrupted Madame Desgranges, "why not let her marry him?"

"I have not the least objection. I give my hearty consent, and with my consent one hundred thousand francs as her dowry. But not the two thousand which Monsieur Grandval demands."

"And why not?" asked Madame Desgranges.

"Because I am not rich enough to give it to my daughter without inconveniencing myself."

"At your age," said Madame Desgranges, "one has not many wants."

"On the contrary, each year brings new ones. Each infirmity is an extra expense. My sight fails; I need glasses. My limbs become feeble; I need a carriage, and so on."

"Come," persisted Madame Desgranges: "I know that you have a good heart. Will it not be a pleasure to you to bleed yourself for your daughter?"

"Ah, you are alluding to the old legend of the pelican, which is said to tear open its own breasts to feed its young. But this has been proved to have no truth in it."

At this moment the young suitor entered. Madeleine saw him, ran to him, and taking him by the hand, said:

"Come Henri, come and help us. My father begins to yield to our entreaties."

"I?" said Desgranges.

"Oh! Monsieur Desgranges!" the young man said with emotion.

Monsieur Desgranges turned to him and said, "I am very glad, Henri, to see you. But, my dear young friend, I fear you have no heart. You are beloved by a charming girl, good, well-educated and affectionate, and you are not willing to marry her because she has not a dowry of 200,000 francs."

"But, father," said Madeleine, "he——"

"Do not interrupt me, my dear. When I married your mother she was worth fifty thousand times less than you."

"Sir!" cried Madame Desgranges.

"I meant to say she had fifty thousand francs less than you will have, but I did not hesitate."

"Neither do I hesitate," said Henri, becoming very much excited. "It is my father who objects."

"Yes," said Madeleine, "it is his father. He himself thinks nothing about the money. He has told me twenty times that he would marry me if I had not a sou—that he would rather I had nothing."

"That is true," said the young man.

"Yes, yes, I know—they all say that. I said it myself, but to myself."

"How?" said Madame Desgranges. "Was it not true, then?"

"What is true is, that I find the maxim that fathers should sacrifice themselves for their children a very stupid one."

"Sacrifice yourself!" said Madeleine. "Do I want you to do that? Do either of us wish it? Will not the money still remain with you?"

"Tut, tut! The money cannot be in two places at once. If I give it to you, I lose it. If I do not give it to you, I keep it. That is as clear as day."

"But, father——"

"My mind is made up. A father should always be richer than his children."

"What does it matter, which is the richer?" said Madame Desgranges. "Will not their home always be ours?"

"Never! A father should never trust to his children for support,—on their own account, so that they may never be ungrateful."

CHAPTER II.

ONE month after this scene, the young people were married. A year later, Madame Desgranges was godmother, and the next year Monsieur Desgranges was godfather. Three years having passed, we find the young couple, with their children, settled with the old people at Villeneuve Saint Georges. I have said that Monsieur Henri Grandval was an architect, but a young architect is, alas too often an architect in name only.

Of all young artists, architects are surely the most unhappy.

Digitized by Google

One does not build houses simply for pleasure, and who is willing to intrust them to a young architect? He has a profession, and no materials to exercise it on. His profession is to build, and he has no buildings to make. This almost broke the good heart of Madame Desgranges, and brought down on the head of Monsieur Desgranges a torrent of abuse and entreaties.

"My dear, I beg of you to increase their income!"

"I shall certainly not do that," answered Monsieur Desgranges. "I am only too well pleased with the way in which I have acted. For I ask you, why have our daughter and son-in-law stayed with us for three months and four days? And why are they going to stay with us until the twentieth of December?"

"What a question! Because they love us, and are happy with us. Because they know that they give us pleasure. Because they are affectionate, tender-hearted——"

"In fact, just the opposite of what I am. Is it not so?" said Monsieur Desgranges, laughing.

Then going to his wife he said: "My dear, I adore you, because you will always remain a child!"

"What! a child!"

"I mean to say that you will always be the same good, naïve, credulous, confiding creature that I married with so much pleasure."

"What do you mean? Naïve, credulous?" answered Madame Desgranges, slightly offended. "Do you pretend that our children are not——"

"No, my dear wife, they are all you say, and more also. But do you really believe that your daughter, who is so pretty that she loves to show herself, because people have pleasure in looking at her—that your son-in-law, with his artistic tastes and his imagination, would leave Paris and the first pleasures of the winter, and make the journey backwards and forwards every day to attend to his business, simply for the pleasure of playing a game of cards with a father-in-law who is beginning to grow deaf, and a mother-in-law who is getting to be rather too talkative."

"But what do you think then? What do you suppose keeps them so long with us?"

"My dear," said Monsieur Desgranges laughingly, "do you remember that, when you were young, and had beautiful hair, you were always delighted to go to the country in order not to have to part it, so as to prevent it growing thin? Well, our children are delighted to stay here, in order to give their purse a rest."

"Shameful! Why not say at once that our children look on our house as an hotel?"

"Doubtless they do, the Inn of the Gold Lion. Here is accommodation for horse and man, for children, who are 'hard up,' and have to economise. If they have spent too much at the theatre, at balls, at concerts, they go to stay a few days with papa. If they want to pay for a little trip, they spend a month with papa. If one of the children is a little ailing, they take him to the country to stay with papa."

"Oh, you miserable creature! You attribute everything to selfishness, even paternal love."

"But suppose, on the contrary," said Monsieur Desgranges, without seeming to hear what his wife said, "suppose that I had doubled my daughter's dowry, as you wished me to do, what would have been the result? Considering my son-in-law's somewhat impulsive disposition, my children to-day would have been no richer, and I should have been much poorer. I should not have been able to keep them here so long, nor to entertain them so well, and they would not have come to stay with us so often, because they would have been better off at home.

"Ah, my dear, if our children were richer than we, my daughter would have found Villeneuve Saint Georges too damp in the autumn on account of the fogs from the river, and would have thought it unhealthy for the children. My son-in-law would have told us that the journey backwards and forwards from Paris every day was too fatiguing for him. This is the advice I give to all fathers whose daughters marry. If you wish to keep your children, keep your money. If you wish to enjoy your grandchildren, keep your money."

CHAPTER III.

It is now the thirtieth of November. The scene is still at Villeneuve Saint Georges. The family of Monsieur Desgranges is a very happy one. He has never seemed so gay and happy. It is the twenty-fifth anniversary of his marriage.

"My dear," he said to his wife, "this is a day which should be celebrated in a dignified manner. Everything must be in the very best style. Let us have a dinner to suit a gourmand (for you know you consider me one). I have told my daughter, who has gone to spend a day in Paris, for some reason that I do not know, that she and her husband must return by the four o'clock train. She will find in her room a pretty new dress, which I wish her to wear to-day.

"For yourself, in order to prove that you still love me a little in spite of all my faults, wear at dinner and in the evening, at the little party we are to have, the diamonds belonging to my poor mother. They represent to me all that I have loved the most in the world—she who gave them to me for you; you who have worn them for my sake and hers, and our daughter who wears them for the sake of all of us." Monsieur Desgranges turned away to hide his emotion.

Why did not Madame Desgranges answer him? Why did she remain for some time immovable with her eyes cast down? Why, when her daughter returned, did she take her weeping into her room? Why was Henri so sad? Why did the announcement of dinner make them all shudder? Why, on entering the dining-room, was the mother so troubled at the sight of her husband?

When he saw her, he exclaimed, "What! you have not put on your diamonds?"

For her only answer, his wife threw herself weeping into his arms. His daughter fell on her knees at his feet, and covered his hands with kisses.

"You have not the diamonds?" he said. "What, then, have you done with them?"

His wife and children were silent.

"You do not answer?" said he in a severe tone. "It is then my turn to speak. I know everything. You have sold them! Sold them to pay for the imprudence of your son-in-law. Yes; because he wished to go into a badly managed speculation; because he has been foolish enough to become security for the rogues who have deceived him; you have considered it necessary, in order to pay half his debt (for he still owes 12,000 francs) to sell the dearest souvenir of my poor mother; the most precious treasure of our love; to poison the joy of this happy day. Oh! it is terrible!"

His wife endeavoured to murmur some excuses.

"It is sufficient!" interrupted Monsieur Desgranges. "Here are the servants. Let us sit down."

The mother and children took their places in silence at the table. As Madame Desgranges opened her napkin she uttered a cry of joy. Her son-in-law did the same, and both rushed to Monsieur Desgranges, their eyes filled with tears.

The mother had found her jewel-box with her diamonds in it on her plate; Henri, the 12,000 francs he needed to pay his debt.

"Ah, my dear husband!"

"My dear father!"

"Enough, enough!" said Monsieur Desgranges, breaking away from their embraces. "You will not, I hope, call me egotistical any longer. Was I right now, in my caution? And do you understand now why a father should always be richer than his children, in order that he may be able to come to their aid in a critical moment, and save them from a terrible catastrophe? Only, my dear son-in-law, do not get into debt again, for I cannot afford to repeat my gift."

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"DELIGHTFUL" TREATMENT FOR CURING CORPULENCE.

The process of curing any physical disorder is so generally the converse of "delightful" that the use of this and similar terms in reference to Mr. F. C. Russell's new popular treatment for corpulency naturally attracts special attention. These terms are to be found in a large number of the letters included in the just issued 18th edition of Mr. Russell's little volume of 256 pages, "Corpulency and the Cure" (Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.) These communications are from persons of both sexes, and it is apparent that their number is represented by thousands annually, who have found in this system of treatment a safe, rapid, and permanent cure for excessive fatness. This testimony forms in the aggregate, indeed, a wonderful record of the rapid reduction of excessive adipose tissue, and those who have personal reasons for being interested in the subject should send to the above address 6d. stamps for a copy of Mr. Russell's notably suggestive little book. "I think the treatment most delightful," writes one out of a large number of equally enthusiastic correspondents. And the expressions "Admirable tonic," "Splendid stuff," "A delicious beverage mixed with mineral waters," are of constant recurrence in this singularly interesting correspondence. The details given by many of the writers of these letters as to the results of the treatment fully justify the use of such eulogistic phrases. It must certainly be delightful to experience the sensation of losing unnecessary and dangerous fat by pounds per week, and frequently stones per month, and that by the aid of treatment which simultaneously increases the appetite and renders its reasonable indulgence innocuous. The experience, too, must be rendered still more delightful by the knowledge, which may be gained from a perusal of Mr. Russell's book, that his preparation is a pure vegetable product, without any admixture of the mineral poisons which are too frequently administered. With a candour which also is delightful, Mr. Russell prints in his book the recipe for the preparation.

SUMMER HEAT AND OBESITY.

Summer heat, with the out-door enjoyments which come in its train, is a source of unmixed delight to all whose physical condition is sound. The full feast of pleasure to which hospitable Nature at this season invites mankind, is not, however, for those whose infirmities forbid them to undergo, without serious discomfort, a considerable amount of bodily fatigue. To those in particular who are the victims of excessive corpulence, the arrival of the genial summer warmth serves chiefly as a painful reminder that, for them, the delights of long woodland rambles, the climbing of mountain tops, and all the adventurous ways of flood and field are prohibited joys. The palpitating heart, the reeling brain, and the possible deadly sunstroke, which are the concomitants of obesity, banish all the pleasant anticipations which once came with the advent of the glad summer-tide. How much of this deprivation of enjoyment and positive misery is absolutely and easily avoidable, may be learned by consulting Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), a little work whose popularity is proved by the fact that its 18th edition has just been issued. This fact, too, indicates, in some degree, the wide area now covered by Mr. Russell's wonderful success as an expert in the reduction of excessive fat. His process, which is absolutely safe and pleasant, is so rapid in its operation that any over-corpulent lady or gentleman can easily get rid of all unnecessary weight in a very few weeks, so as to be able, before the autumn is with us, to enjoy the delightful feeling (and the appearance too) of renewed youth and energy. Mr. Russell makes no mystery of the nature of his curative preparation—apparently miraculous as are its effects in simultaneously reducing weight and increasing appetite—the consequently larger amount of food being consumed with impunity. He prints, therefore, his recipe in his singularly suggestive book, which may be obtained from Booksellers, or by sending 6d. stamps to his offices, Woburn House, 27, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NOT KNOWING WHAT ELSE TO DO.

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

TO save ourselves trouble and suffering by learning from the experiences of others—that is the wisdom of history. Otherwise every generation, and every man and woman therein, would have to begin back where their ancestors did. Every soul of us has to learn the alphabet for himself; but after that he can read and benefit by what others have written. Is that idea plain as peas in a split pod? Yes. Well, then, let us see whether it has anything to say to the facts set forth in the following letter:—

"After my confinement," writes a woman, "in August of last year (1893), I could not get up my strength. My food did not seem to be of any use to me. In some way I was ill, but I could not give a name to the ailment. My tongue was swollen and thickly coated, and I was constantly spitting out the thick phlegm which gathered in my throat and mouth. No matter how little food I took—even a morsel—it gave me great pain at the chest and sides; and sometimes it would dart through to my back between the shoulders.

"Often I would be sick and heave and strain until I was quite sore. Then, again, a pain would take me in the stomach and cut through me like a knife. I had a dry, hacking cough which never left me, and I sweated terribly at night. The cough was so bad that I often had to hold my sides when I had spells of it.

"Nearly every bit of flesh went off my bones, and I got so weak I couldn't put my foot to the ground. People said I was in a consumption, and I had little hope of getting better. I was so nervous that the least noise would startle and upset me. Those who called said it was pitiable to see the condition I was in.

"I saw two doctors who gave me medicines, but I only got worse and worse. At the end of October (1893) I came by a small book telling about Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup, and, not knowing what else to do, I sent to Mr. Baxter, the druggist, Brookhouse, and got a bottle. After I had taken it but a few days, I was better. I could eat something, and it stayed on my stomach, and the pain was less severe. As I took dose after dose of the Syrup the improvement went on, all the bad feeling abated, and I gained strength. It wasn't long before the cough was quite gone, and I was well and strong as ever.

"After my recovery, a neighbour said to me, 'Mrs. Redhead, you have made my heart sad many a time when I saw you so bad.'

"'Thank you,' I replied, 'and I was sad enough myself, but Mother Seigel's Syrup had made me glad again, for it has given me back my good health.'

"And in thankfulness for it I am very willing you should publish what I have told you. (Signed) Mrs. Mary Jane Redhead, 73, Peter Street, Blackburn, April 4th, 1894."

We congratulate Mrs. Redhead, and tender our regards to the kind-hearted neighbour who was so sorry for her. But what a pity that Mrs. R. didn't know in August what she learned in October—namely that her disease was indigestion and dyspepsia, and that Mother Seigel's Syrup is a cure for it; some folks say the only cure. Well, we suppose she had to wait her turn to find that out. There's a deal of mystery about these things.

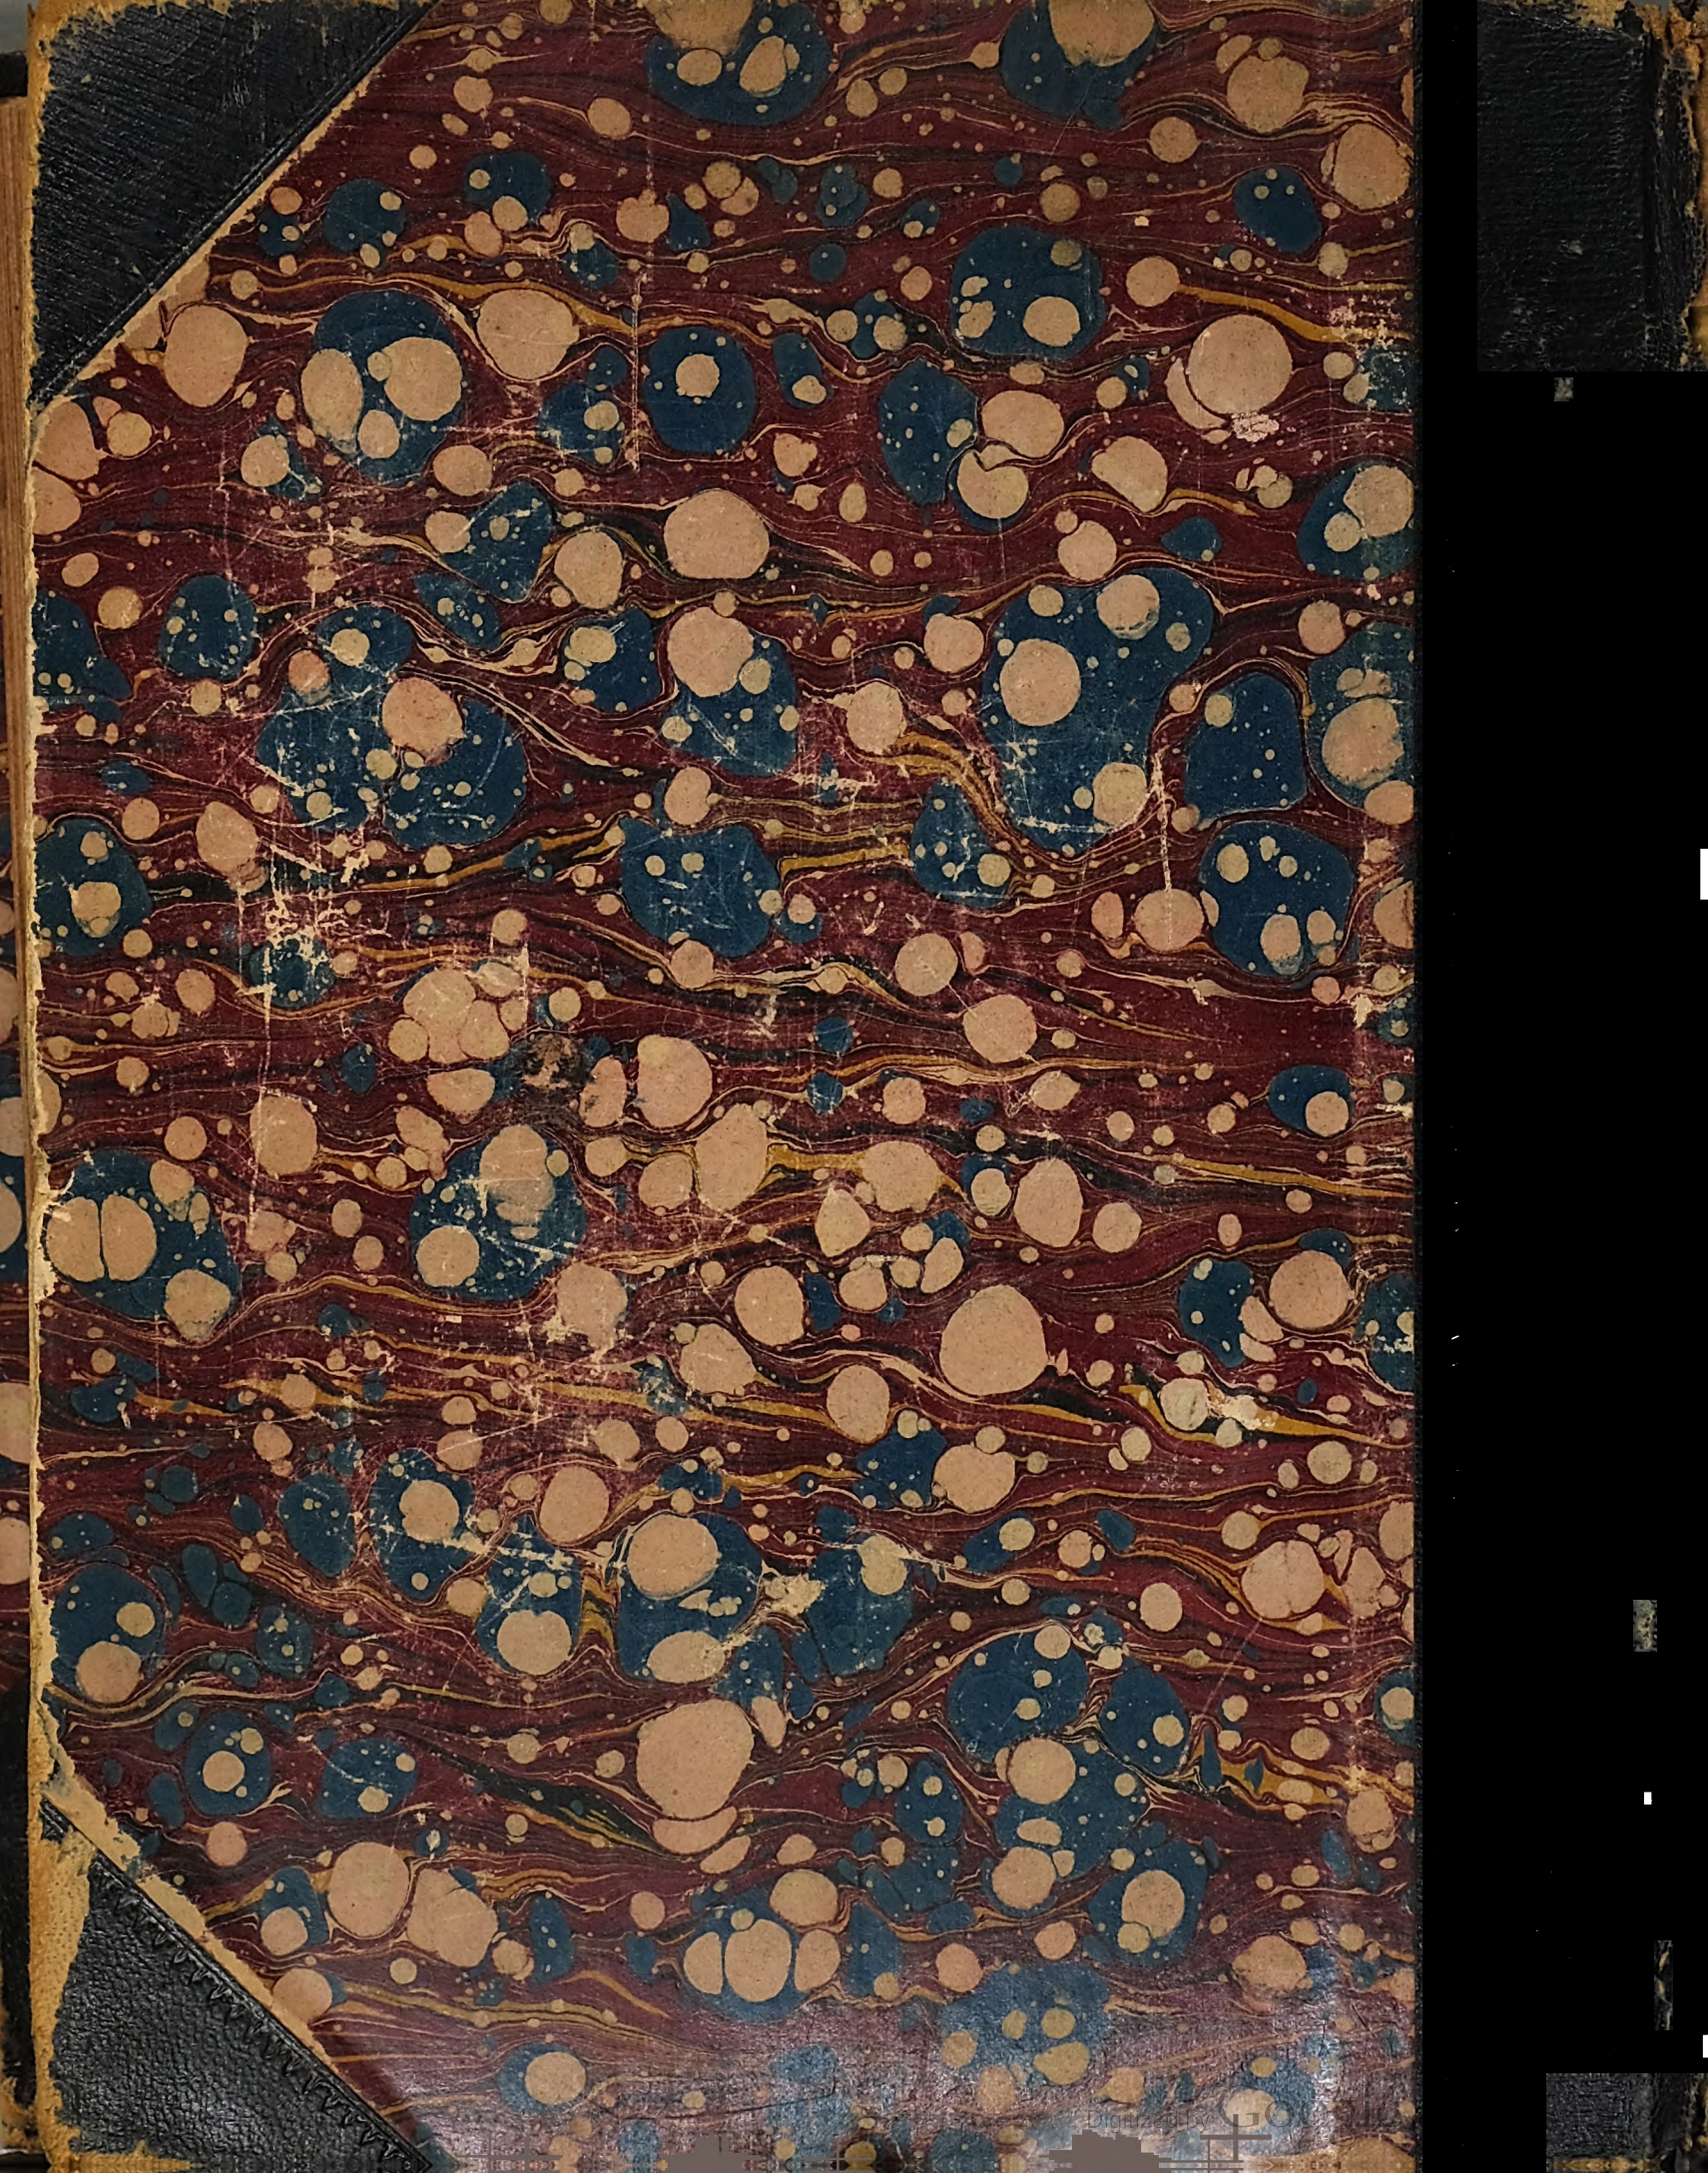
Anyway, she knows now, and the printing of her story will enable lots of other sufferers to begin where she left off. They won't take the Syrup as she did, not knowing what else to do, but they will take it the very day they fall ill, knowing that to be exactly the right thing to do.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google


Digitized by Google